Deals Savage Blow to Germans, Seizes Commanding Ground

By ANDREW TULLY
Traveler Staff Correspondent

WITH NEW ENGLAND'S OWN YANKEE DIVISION BEYOND NANCY, Oct. 24—The Yanks, the real, genuine, authentic article, have landed. First full division to fight on French soil in the last World War, the famous 26th Division today won its first battle and gained its first objective.

HITS SAVAGE BLOW

Its ranks bulging with Bostonians and New Englanders and commanded by a general from Shrewsbury, this outfit went into action in the same sector where it fought a great campaign in 1918 and along these rutty roads and in the mud spattered fields and on the lips of these scowling hills the fresh and steel hardened Y-D delivered a sharp and savage blow to grim and tightened German defenses.

The Yankee Division was facing the rough and tough elite of the fight and it pushed

THE 26TH

New Englanders learn with a feeling of pride that the 26th Division, the famous Yankee Division of World War I, is now fighting in France. It is no longer an all-New England division, but our interest in its accomplishments will not diminish. The brilliant record of the 26th Division in the last war can never be dimmed. And, certainly, we can never forget the men who fought so bravely to bring it glory. Carry on, 26th! Your valor springs from rich tradition.

BOSTON TRAVELER, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 25,

Maj. Sullivan Was Dentist In Milton

Maj. George A. Sullivan, Jr., 32, who is mentioned in Andrew Tully's story about the 26th Division today, is the husband of Mrs. Dorothy Herrick Sullivan of Highland street, Newton, and son of Dr. and Mrs. George A. Sullivan of 40 Westside road, Milton. He has one child, George A., the 3rd, whom he saw just before going overseas in August. A graduate of Holy Cross College in the class of 1937 and the Harvard Dental School in 1941, he practiced dentistry in Milton before entering the service in 1941 and had been on the staff of the Massachusetts General Hospital. He was a member of the Massachusetts National Guard, serving in the 101st medical regiment. He was graduated from Ft. Benning Infantry School and the Commander General school at Ft. Leavenworth. He is now an assistant chief of staff with the 26th Division, serving in GI, personnel. His brother, Capt. John J. Sullivan, USA, is with the ordnance department in Southern France. He has a sister, Josephine, associated with the White Health Unit, Savin street, Dorchester.

'Yankee' From Atlanta Won't Forget Division's First Attack

By CARLYLE HOLT

WITH THE 26TH DIVISION, France, Oct. 25 (Via Press Wireless)—Capt T. J. Denton, an air support officer with the Yankee Division, lives in Atlanta, an odd place for a Yankee to come from.

He joined the division after it entered the lines of the 3d Army and has been with the outfit three weeks. He will not soon forget the first time squadron fighter bombers from the 19th Tactical Command of the 6th Air Force worked with the 26th Division.

The occasion was the first sizeable attack put on by the division. Infantry advanced against several strong points and two towns. The attack was preceded by bombing and strafing by our P-47s. Part of the purpose of the attack was to acquaint our infantry with air support during operations. It was Capt Denton's job to guide the air attack.

Walked Almost Into Jerries

The night before the attack Capt Denton went forward with a lieutenant of the attacking infantry to the new regimental command post. This post shelter was close to the jump-off spot. The two officers started after dark in a jeep and left the machine at a point where the lieutenant said the road was closest to the command post. The lieutenant said he knew the way, so the two men set out in the darkness.

"We walked what seemed a hell of a long way," said Denton in a soft drawl that never could have come from Boylston st., "and I finally said, 'You sure you know the way, lieutenant.' The lieutenant said, 'Sure, this is right.'"

"After that we walked an awful long way, it seemed to me," said Denton. "Furthermore, directly towards the Germans, I thought. It was blacker than crime and we could not see much of anything. Then we came out on a road and crossed another road and the lieutenant said, 'I guess we turn right here.'"

"So we turned right and walked some more and did not meet anybody. Then finally we got challenged, and boy! I was sure glad to hear that American voice come out of the night, even if the guy did sound like a damned Yankee."

"We answered the sentry and quick, and then we asked him for the regimental command post. He told us where it was and then I said, 'Where are the Jerries?' The sentry said, 'O, about 200 yards over there.' 'Two hundred yards!' I exclaimed. 'What are we doing here? This is no place for Mrs. Denton's little boy! How did I get here; let's was election day eve IN It wasn't much different from this other days, but it was a little different. Guys like Pvt. Al Brady of King street, Dorchester, stretched their arms and legs against the crumbling earthen walls of water-soaked foxholes and threw mud pit to wake up their buddies and yet that back in the States they were about to elect a commander-in-chief.

RAINING IN SHEETS

Guys like Brady and Walt Burke of 23 Forest street, Newton Highlands, and Jack Rosen of 100 Colborne street, Brighton, were more than vaguely aware that today was a big day. But it was raining again, this time in sheets that a high wind picked up and threw around the landscape like a big slap in the face. The boys did what they could to keep partially dry before shooting any breeze about politics. Then for awhile there was a little talk about Roosevelt and they had a couple of the boys from the political wards in Boston reminiscing quietly about the neighborhood excitement they used to share back in the days when they were "poor civilians." You figured the most wistful guy of the bunch was Master Sgt. Frank J. Brennan of 144 Calumet street, Roxbury, an old timer of 47 summers who used to be an election day runner for Mayor Tobin. But Brennan had too much to do to think about it because the top ranking enlisted man in a battalion is always harassed by a million little details even on election day.

It's hard to put down on paper just what the boys in the Yankee Division did think about today. I

WITH THE TWENTY-SIXTH DIVISION BEYOND NANCY, Oct. 24 (Delayed)—The official communique spoke calmly of "light patrol activity and sporadic artillery fire." But to Boston's own Yankee Division, today was one of those maddening interludes of modern war when the foot-soldier sprawls in his foxhole for 24 long hours and curses all rain and all mud.

In the line only a few days, the YD was discovering that this static Nancy front was almost always wet and uncomfortable and frequently duller than Louisiana maneuvers.

It has rained almost continuously for a week. It rained again today. The gray skies deluged the infantryman with an almost torrential downpour this morning. This afternoon, although the heavens dripped only occasionally, it was damp and unhealthy and uncomfortable. The Yankee Division griped. It was hard for a fresh outfit

THIRD ARMY FRONT IN FRANCE, Oct. 23 (AP)—Infantrymen from the famed 26th Division are attacking in the Bezange-Moncourt area east of Nancy, it was disclosed today. The organization, commanded by Maj Gen Willard S. Paul, was known as the "Yankee Division" in the first World War when most of its personnel was drawn from Boston and New England.

It now has men from all over the country, in line with the Army policy of reorganization of National Guard formations. But it still has a sizable nucleus of New Englanders.

In immediate command of current attack is Col Dwight Cooley, former Providence, R. I., businessman, whose home is at Saunderson, R. I. He fought with the 26th in this same general area in 1917 as a company commander of the same regiment.

The 26th came into France through Cherbourg without a stop in Britain, being one of the first to arrive that way.

YANKEE DIVISION WINS NEW HONORS IN FRANCE

Still boasting a sizable nucleus of New England men in its ranks, the 26th Division, which won fame as the Yankee Division in the World War, was disclosed in dispatches from the Third Army front yesterday as having gained new honors in this war in the attack in the Bezange-Moncourt area east of Nancy.

Its commanding officer, too, is Maj.-Gen. Willard S. Paul, 50, of Shrewsbury, who enlisted as a private in 1916 and remained in the Army after the close of the last war. In line with the Army policy of reorganization of National Guard units, the 26th now includes men from all parts of the country, rather than from just Boston and New England, but it was revealed there are still enough Yankees in the outfit to make Boston baked beans a Saturday night ritual at headquarters.

In immediate command of the present attack is Col. Dwight Cooley of Saunderson, R. I., a former Providence businessman. He fought with the 26th in the same general area in 1917, and now is back as commander of the same regiment. The division's present make-up includes the 328th, the 101st and the 104th infantry regiments, of which the latter is conducting the main part of the attack.

Yankee Division Takes Vital City Near Metz

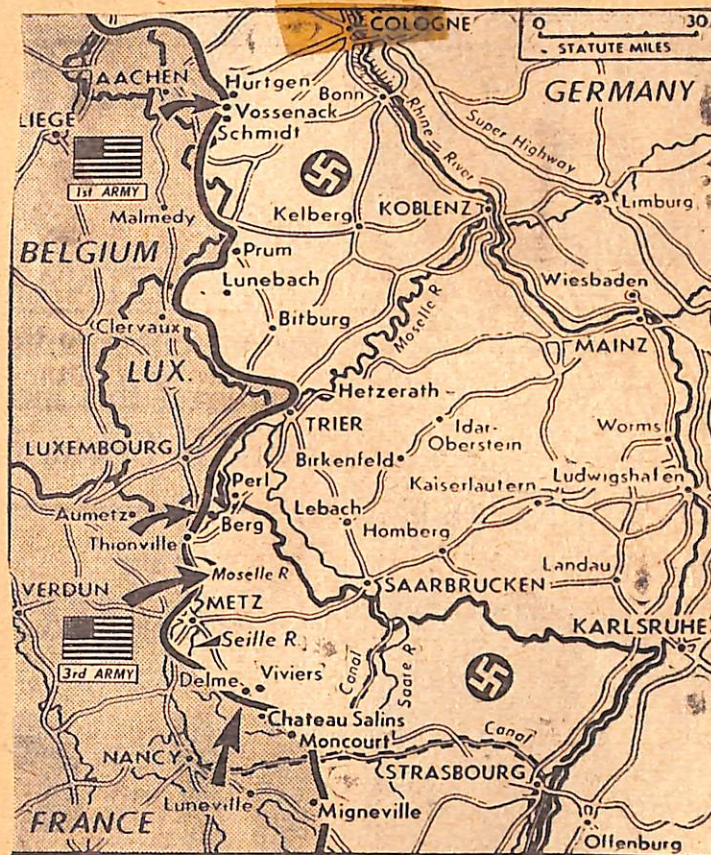

PARIS, Nov. 10 (UP)—American 3d Army tanks and infantrymen captured Chateau Salins and slogged slowly eastward through stiffening German resistance today, after a three-mile overnight advance that threatened to unhinge the Nazi battle lines in the Seille River valley, south of Metz.

Chateau Salins, 16 miles northeast of Nancy and 23 miles southeast of Metz, fell shortly before midnight last night to the 104th Infantry Regiment of the 26th "Yankee" Division. The Germans after beating off repeated American attempts to take the town, pulled out under cover of darkness and dug in farther east.

Town after town in the chain of German defenses covering the Metz fortress from the north and south fell to Lt Gen George S. Patton's hard-driving veterans, but field dispatches indicated the going was getting tougher by the hour as the American offensive thundered through its third day.

Mud, Swollen Rivers Hamper Attacks, but Fail to Halt Tanks

By GENE CURKIVAN
(Boston Herald-N. Y. Times Wireless)

WITH THE THIRD ARMY, Nov. 9—Mud and swollen rivers delayed the progress of the Third Army's line straightening operation along the Metz-Nancy front again today, although several new crossings of the Moselle were achieved and eight additional towns taken. Thirteen hundred heavy bombers supported the ground troops with skies clearing just after noon.

While mud continued to play into the hands of the enemy, it failed to stop the elements of the Fourth Armored Division, which went across the Seille river for a maximum advance of 2½ miles in the direction of Delme. Observations made around this sector, which is surmounted by a large tabletop ridge, showed that the enemy apparently was withdrawing from the

HEADQUARTERS 9TH AIR FORCE, WITH 3D ARMY, Nov. 9

(Delayed)—All a war correspondent sees of a battle is what goes on around him. One of the worst possible spots from which to see a battle is on the battlefield. Hollywood does it much better than real soldiers. Over here, if you get close enough to see what is going on, you will see very little anyway, and very likely get your head blown off in addition—in which case you have no story.

So the best I can do is attempt to describe what we actually did and saw today while in a sector of the 26th Division. The first item is a weather report. Rain fell all last night. This morning the skies were thick with heavy clouds, and a mist hung on the ground. By mid-forenoon the sun shone brightly on a dripping land. By noon the skies were covered with a dull gray again and blinding snow flurries obscured everything. These were varied with sprays of sleet. By midafternoon the skies were again covered by masses of broken clouds which shed drenching showers. A cold, blustery wind blew out of the northwest.

Nazis Try Rockets

Crossing the Moselle River on the way to our division we saw the swollen muddy stream over the banks. Pools of water stood in the meadows along the river. But great spaces of blue sky appeared overhead in time for us to watch an attack by the 8th Air Force heavy bombers—hundreds of them—streaming across the sky in perfect formations of tiny silver specks. Evidently the Germans tried to shoot them down with rocket projectiles, for repeatedly strange white streaks rose from the ground level with amazing rapidity to dizzy levels. The streaks were not regular but jagged and uneven and there were many of them drawn on the blue sky.

We intended to find Capt T. K. Denton, air support party officer with the division, and go with him for he would know where the best observation posts would be and where the action would most likely take place. But we missed him. So we lunched with Mess Sgt John McLaughlin of 308 Lowell st., Somerville, a justly celebrated mess sergeant, who gave us hot soda biscuits, hamburger patties and all the fixings—although he had only set up in a dilapidated cafe the night before. Give him another couple of days and he may be serving broiled lobster and strawberry shortcake. Thereafter we set out to find the observation post overlooking the Seille River valley and Chateau Salins—then under the threat of being outflanked by the infantry advance. We reached Bezange Le Grande and went from there up and over a high densely-wooded ridge. The road became steadily worse and finally we admitted we were lost.

Many North Shore Men

Further progress became very difficult as the mud was up to our hubs. We finally got stuck. Luckily the jeep, driven by Pvt Leslie Gates

SUPREME HEADQUARTERS, ALLIED EXPEDITIONARY FORCE, Paris, Thursday, Nov. 9 (AP)—Elements of United States 3d Army Infantry lashed out in a two-pronged attack along the snake-like Metz-Nancy front yesterday, capturing 16 towns and advancing up to three miles on a seven-mile-wide front.

(Front dispatches said elements taking part included the Yankee (26th) Division, the Blue Ridge (80th) Division, the Rainbow (42d) Division and the Santa Fe (35th) Division.

(Attacking on the 35th's right flank, the Yankee (26th) Division struck swiftly to secure a bridge across the Seille, 18 miles east of Nancy, before the Germans could blow it and then pushed up to three miles northward into high ground dominating Chateau Salins.

(The Yankee Division, under Maj Gen Willard Paul, also occupied Vic-Sur-Seille and Moyenvic and fought its way into Salles, which late this afternoon was ablaze.

America is a faraway land that exists only as kind of a blurred dream when the total darkness of war settles on the dirty battle ground.

OUT OF REACH

The men up front, intent 24 hours a day on keeping as comfortable and as safe as possible—both are almost beyond attainment—usually are too busy even to dream of that America that floats through the haze of their day from time to time. TERRIFIC BARRAGE

Stepping off as the dawn broke through clearing, gray clouds and pea soup mists, after a terrific ear-splitting artillery barrage reminiscent of World War I heavy gun duels, Massachusetts' own infantry outfit buckled the surprised German line in several places. It advanced three miles over cruel fighting terrain, capturing five towns in its path and ending the day with its guns on commanding ground overlooking the strategic town of Chateau Salins, 16½ miles northeast of Nancy.

Nowhere else today did other more-seasoned soldiers do as well as the YD, joined with the 80th and 35th divisions in the surprise attack. Gen. George S. Patton, commander of the Third Army, paid a

Today I spent the afternoon with the men of the 328th Regiment's 2nd battalion, just pulled out of the line after three weeks under fire, and although the setup was a little piece of Heaven for these weary, bearded warriors the average civilian would be horrified at the idea of spending an hour at their camp. In the first place you can't pull men all the way back to Paris for a rest, so the 2nd battalion pitched its pup tents against the slopes of three low hills only a few miles from the front. "YD" Outfit Beats Order for Withdrawal

WITH THE U. S. THIRD ARMY,
France, Nov. 6 (AP)—Here is one way a green division may be transformed into a real fighting unit:

After the 26th "Yankee" Division moved into the line recently, its 104th
Infantry Regiment, under Colonel Dwight Colley, was given the job of taking limited objectives, including Bois de Moncourt.

The regiment quickly gained most of its objectives, but after three days it had cleared only about two-thirds of the Moncourt woods, and divisional commander, Major General Willard
Paul, decided to relieve the 104th.

Colonel Colley of Saundertown, R. I., and who commanded a company of the 104th in this area in the first World war, heard that his unit was coming out at 6 o'clock in the morning, so he hurried out to the front, arriving at 4 a. m.

He told his men, in effect, "we are supposed to take that woods and we have two hours left to do it. The colonel led the attack personally and the woods were taken in an hour and a half.

Armored Units Cross Moselle, Take 12 Towns

LONDON, Nov. 9 (AP)—The United States 3d Army hurled four more divisions today into a major offensive along a 55-mile front in Northern France. The assault by three infantry divisions broke across the Moselle 18 miles north of the mighty fortress of Metz, as a crack tank division roared into battle from the south.

Enemy lines were ripped by more than 1300 United States heavy bombers, thundering over in the first close support on such a big scale since the St. Lo breakthrough that won the Battle of France. By sundown the Germans had yet to send a tank into the struggle.

A dozen towns were overrun as Lt Gen George S. Patton Jr. sent the infantry divisions and the 4th Armored Division—one of the architects of the St. Lo victory—into the spreading battle to join the three infantry outfits that seized 16 towns and 1000 prisoners in the opening assault yesterday.

After the bombers loosed 4000 tons of anti-personnel bombs on the sleet-covered German positions, the veteran 90th Division struck for the first time north of Metz.

PARIS, Nov. 9 (UP)—Lt.-Gen. George S. Patton hurled elements of three more divisions into a developing offensive aimed at the Saar basin today, and two of them struck out north of Metz to clamp a pincers around that bastion.

The other division, joining three more which went over the top south of Metz yesterday, swept across the swollen Moselle river in a dawn attack and captured Cheminot, 10 miles below the ancient French stronghold.

Patton's offensive appeared designed to encircle and envelop Metz and roll up the remainder of the German defenses guarding the Saar valley some 20 or more miles to the northeast.

A score or more of towns, villages and hamlets already have been overrun in the new offensive along a 40-mile front stretching from the Rhine-Marne canal southeast of Nancy to a point north of Metz.

A German Transocean agency military commentator said Patton had massed 1000 tanks and 500,000 men, and warned that it must be considered "but the first act of a large-scale autumn offensive against the

Maj. John A. MacKillop of 381 Broadway, Cambridge, 328th regimental surgeon for the 26th Division, has his "hospital" set up in a de luxe dugout tunneled out of a steep bank in the middle of a shell-hot sector. You stoop to get through the blanket-hung entrance, but once past a log-roofed tunnel you stretch to your full height in the major's well-equipped dressing station.

LOOKING FOR WHISKEY

Right now the major is looking for a source where he can get good, rough American whiskey for his chilled casualties. He's been giving them a shot of medicinal alcohol laced with grapefruit juice, but he'd like to be able to offer them a "warmer" drink.

Greater Boston men with the rough and tough Fourth Armored Division are sharing in the outfit's many decorations. Cpl. John F. Walfe, 25, of 19 Jefferson road, Winchester, gunner on a tank destroyer, has been awarded the Bronze Star for leaving his vehicle and going to the aid of six men wounded by tank fire. Patrick E. Hanlon, 29, of 6 Park place, Arlington, has been given the same decoration for driving his half track through three and a half miles of fierce enemy barrage during the attack on the city of Troyes.

Here in Boston's own Yankee Division the combat infantryman's badge for "exemplary conduct in action against the enemy," has been awarded to Joseph P. Ambrose of 56 Green street, Jamaica Plain; Pfc. Richard L. White of 16 Thayer street, Hingham; Tech. Sgt. Adolph T. Pos of Main street, Sunderland and Sgt. Louis J. Alfieri of 76 Franklin street, Somerville.

Promoted in the field were Pfc. Pompei Peone of 944 East Street, Walpole, to staff sergeant, and Staff Sgt. Gerad Leone of 180 Chapel street, Newton, to technical sergeant.

When shrapnel from an exploding enemy shell spattered a YD company command post the other day, Capt. Domenic Prato of 46 Norman street, East Boston, picked up a couple of minor scratches. That was okay with him but when he took inventory and found that a larger piece of hot lead had punctured his beloved air mattress, lugged all the way from the states, the good captain hit what was left of the command post's roof.

CHAMPAGNE CACHE

Lt.-Col. Bernard Lyons of 26 Sparks street, Cambridge, and Lt. Athur W. Blackwell of Fuller street, Dorchester, were looking for trouble when they led a patrol the other night into the town of Xanrey, from which enemy sniper fire had been coming. They found the town deserted and were bemoaning a wasted evening when a couple of noncom scroungers reported the discovery of a cache of 12 bottles of champagne. Since then company commanders in the 26th Division's 101st Regiment have been flooded with volunteers for night patrol duty.

Somewhere in Germany, Lt. Edward R. Cassidy of Medford, member of a small Allied Military Government team, probably is giving the stork a helping hand as usual. Lt. Cassidy, whom I met in a cafe in Chalons one day, estimates he has helped bring at least a score of French infants into the world, in addition to his other duties. A graduate of St. Anselm College in 1942, Lt. Cassidy landed in France a week after D-Day, and since then has been doctor, lawyer, father confessor and general trouble shooter for a long list of French towns. His biggest job was evacuating 1000 people in two hours from a town about to become a battlefield.

Capt. William R. Porter of 22 Lakeville road, Jamaica Plain has been promoted to major. One of the "originals" in the 26th Division, Maj. Porter enlisted in 1933 in the national guard, from which the YD was activated.

ROAST BEEF LUNCH

Prowling around the front you never know what you're going to run into. After eating breakfast standing up in the rain at 26th Division headquarters today, I dropped in on the 328th Regiment for lunch and sat down to a genuine table in a little French house for a meal of roast beef, potatoes and canned peas. My table mates were almost all Greater Boston men, including Capt. Walter Carew, the headquarters company commandant, of 94 Ashcroft road, Medford; Maj. William A. Callanan of 115 Barnes avenue, East Boston, and Capt. E. Gardner Goldsmith of 25 Michigan avenue, Lynn.

Later I went outside and shot the breeze with Master Sgt. George A. Levasseur of Wisteria street, Salem; Cpl. Trowbridge Bent of 110 Edgell road, Framingham Centre, a mail clerk, and genial M.P. Pfc. Leonard Kahn of 173 Harvard street, Dorchester. In the cellar operations room I ran into Master Sgt. Ludwig

Johnson of 27 Winnemay street, Natick, who asked me to send his regards to Joe Horrigan of the Traveler copy desk. Also there was Staff Sgt. Harold C. Peters of 43 Upton street, South End, the message center chief.

Tonight, I'm going to dine in style in a nearby town where the 19th Tactical Air Command is billeted. I'll be the guest of Capt. Fred H. Guterman of 25 Wauwinet road, West Newton, ordnance officer of 19th TAC. Before dinner we'll have an aperitif or two in Capt. Guterman's own plushy "Club Manhattan," which the Newtonite has set up for weary fliers in the basement of the building.

Don't know how they do it, but these air force guys manage the most impeccable personal appearance I've ever seen around here and before I venture into their midst I've got to try to get about a quarter of a ton of mud off my trench coat.

Have I mentioned that it still is raining?

Maj. W. A. Callanan Was Officer in M.N.G.

Maj. William A. Callanan, mentioned in Andrew Tully's story today as a companion at a dinner "somewhere inside Germany," is the husband of Mrs. Pauline (White) Callanan and the son of Mrs. Mary A. Callanan of 1119 Saratoga street, East Boston. A National Guard officer for 16 years, the 40-year-old major has been in active service since 1940, prior to which he served in the communication department of the state police in Boston for six years. A graduate of training schools at Fort Benning, Fort Leavenworth and of the Intelligence training center at Camp Ritchie, Va., he has been overseas since September. Father of three children, he has two brothers, Capt. John J., of the Army Air Corps, stationed in Newark, and Edward V., with the Coast Guard.

Patton Unleashes 7 Tank, Infantry Divisions on Metz

LONDON, Nov. 9 (AP)—The U. S. Third Army hurled four more divisions today into a major offensive along a 55-mile front in northern France. The assault by three infantry divisions broke across the Moselle 18 miles north of the mighty fortress of Metz as a crack tank division roared into battle from the south.

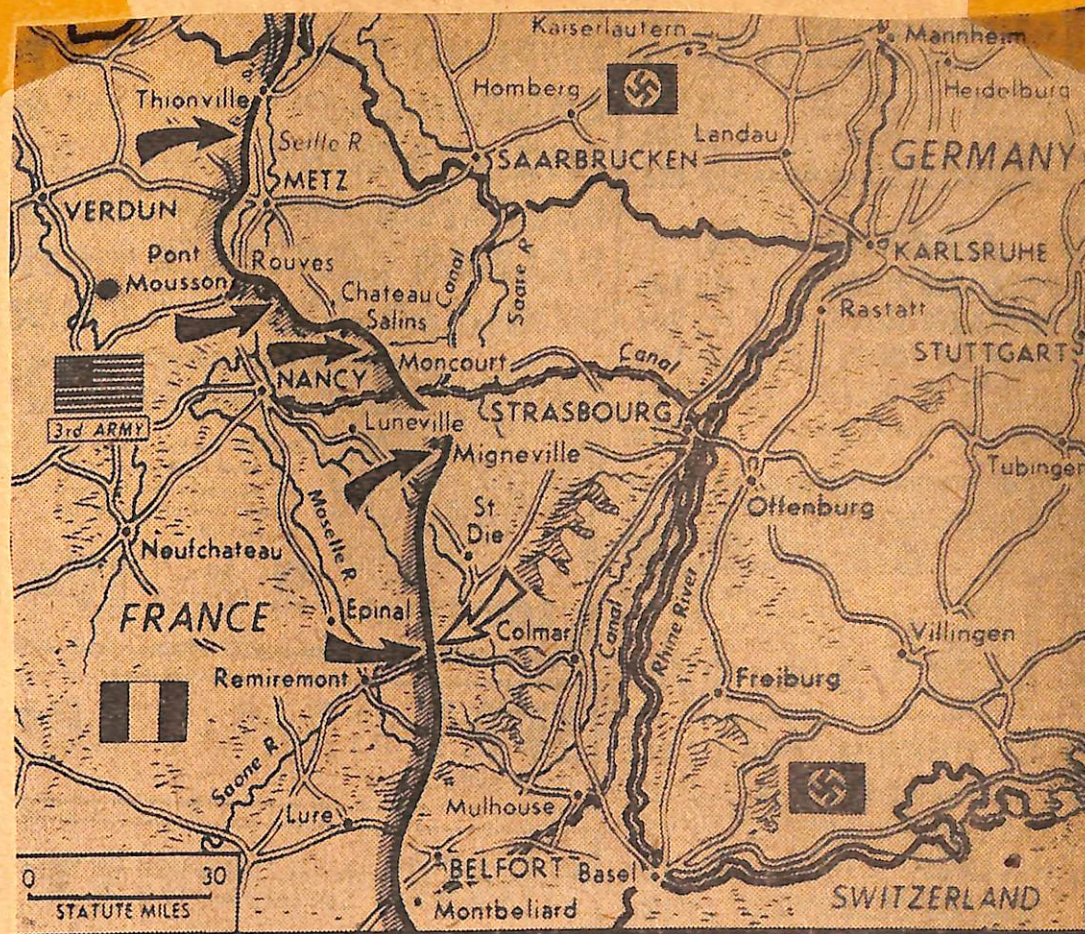

Enemy lines were ripped by more than 1300 U. S. heavy bombers, thundering over in the first close support on such a big scale since the St. Lo breakthrough that won the battle of France. By sundown the Germans had yet to send a tank into the struggle.

A dozen towns were overrun as Lt.-Gen. George S. Patton, Jr., sent the infantry divisions and the Fourth Armored Division—one of the architects of the St. Lo victory—into the spreading battle to join the three infantry outfits that seized 16 towns and 1000 prisoners in the opening assault yesterday.

After the bombers loosed 4000 tons of anti-personnel bombs on the sleet-covered German positions, the veteran 90th Division struck for the first time north of Metz.

WITH THE 26TH DIVISION ON THE MOSELLE FRONT, Nov. 2 (Delayed) — November nights out here are long and dark and cold for the line soldier shifting miserably in his slit trench or creeping cautiously over the ruts and holes and scrub brush on patrols in No Man's Land. America is a faraway land that exists only as kind of a blurred dream when the total darkness of war settles on the dirty battle ground.

Politics All Wet In YD Foxholes

By ANDREW TULLY
(Traveler Staff Correspondent)

WITH THE 26TH DIVISION IN THE RAIN, Nov 7 (Delayed)—This was election day even along the dripping, muddy front.

It wasn't much different from other days, but it was a little different. Guys like Pvt. Al Brady of 1 King street, Dorchester, stretched their arms and legs against the crumbling earthen walls of water-soaked foxholes and threw mud pies to wake up their buddies and yell that back in the States they were about to elect a commander-in-chief.

RAINING IN SHEETS

Guys like Brady and Walt Burke of 23 Forest street, Newton Highlands, and Jack Rosen of 100 Colborne street, Brighton, were more than vaguely aware that today was a big day. But it was raining again, this time in sheets that a high wind picked up and threw around the landscape like a big slap in the face. The boys did what they could to keep partially dry before shooting any breeze about politics.

Then for awhile there was a little talk about Roosevelt and Dewey and a couple of the boys from hot political wards in Boston reminisced quietly about the neighborhood excitement they used to share back in the days when they were "poor civilians." You figured the most wistful guy of the bunch was Master Sgt. Frank J. Brennan of 144 Calumet street, Roxbury, an old timer of 47 summers who used to be an election day runner for Mayor Tobin. But Brennan had too much to do to think about it because the top ranking enlisted man in a battalion is always harassed by a million little details even on election day.

It's hard to put down on paper just what the boys in the Yankee Division did think about today. I suppose they were glad that back in the states you people could still be holding a democratic election but no one would be caught making such a dramatic statement.

COULDN'T DO MUCH

You could sense among the men, as you made your shambling way through the embracing mud and blinding rain, a feeling that this day was a little different. Nobody had to be reminded that this was election day, but there wasn't much they could do about it except make little jokes and then go back to make their own personal existence a little happier.

Pvt Bill Riordan of 34 Gorham road, Belmont, naturally was more interested in bailing out the nest where his machine gun was placed. Rain water which had crept five inches up the wall of his trench would be wetting the seat of his pants pretty soon and how is a guy going to think clearly about even such a vital issue as demobilization with such an emergency looming deeper by the moment.

And look at SGT. Anthony Perry of 24 Beech street, Cambridge. He was out in a dripping clump of woods struggling through the morass with his patrol. Perry knew we were electing a president, but he'd think about it when he had time.

It wasn't because most of the boys who were eligible already had voted. Sure, they'd done what they could weeks ago on that square of paper, but today was their voting day just the same. A couple of them even were out of your eyes, to notice it.

Yanks Mark Nov. 11 On Old Battle Sites

By PIERRE J. HUSS

WITH THE U. S. THIRD ARMY, France (INS)—At intervals along this fighting front yesterday, silhouetted against a backdrop of flaming villages and leafless, dying trees, occasional American officers and noncoms stood bareheaded in silent memory to those who died in the first World War.

It was just 26 years ago today that American and German guns boomed their last salvos over the front in this very sector northeast of Nancy. The same villages and towns were in smoking ruins then. The fields where mud-caked doughboys are slogging forward in the age-old way of the infantry then were oozy quagmires, pitted with shellholes. Then, as now, anyone who dropped a rifle lost it in the slime; trucks and tanks sank wheel-deep or bulled their way through like wallowing hogs.

A few of the veterans, mostly grim-visaged officers and noncoms, paused by battered village monuments to give a moment's thought to Nov. 11, 1918. Others wistfully pointed out from a jeep some well-remembered field in which they heard that memorable 11 a. m. bugle blow.

Formal Armistice Day observations were held for the first time since 1939 on various old and new battlegrounds, including Verdun, the Meuse and the Argonne.

Honoring 14,000 American dead of the Meuse-Argonne campaigns at Romagne, Brig. Gen. Charles R. Doran declared, "We cannot deceive ourselves into believing that complete victory will be quick or easy."

Gen. Doran, who was wounded 1000 yards from the present cemetery in 1918, continued:

"We have tough fighting ahead. Every one of us will be called upon to redouble our efforts for all-out victory."

Among the active 1918 veterans present in the combat areas are Lt. Gen. Courtney H. Hodges, Lt. Gen. Patton, and Maj. Gen. Walton H. Walker, commander of the 20th Corps.

Five-Mile Gain Puts Yanks Close to Saar

WITH THE UNITED STATES 3D ARMY IN FRANCE, Nov. 11 (AP)—American tanks and infantry slashed five miles deeper into the defenses of Metz today, fighting up to the Nied River nine miles east and slightly south of the fortress and breaking across the stream at one point.

While German resistance stiffened, gains of five and seven miles were racked up on this Armistice Day—the fourth day of a drive which might well develop into the last great push on the Western Front.

Lt Gen George S. Patton Jr., celebrating his 59th birthday, had split the German defenders south of the fort-ringed city and had tanks marauding 18 miles from the Saar border near Saarbrücken, where they had cut one of Metz's rail lines by which it is supplied from the east.

Nazis Admit U. S. Gains

(Although there was no armistice on any section of the 450-mile front, the only other major activity reported was on the United States 1st Army sector, where the Doughboys still were slugging it out with the Germans southeast of Aachen in Hurtgen Forest.

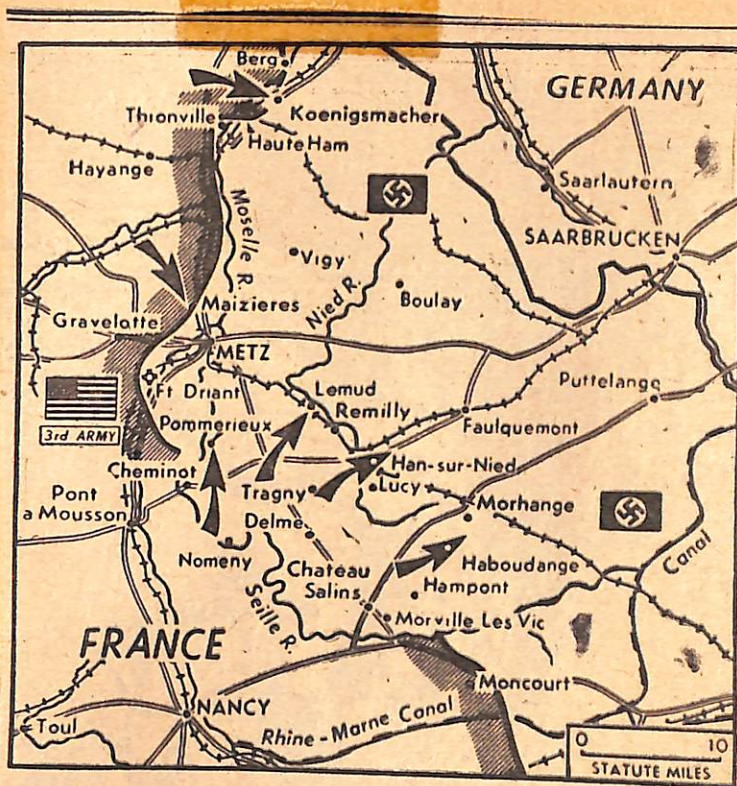

German high command spokesman said Patton "has now engaged about two-thirds of his tank forces on the right wing" and that "here his progress is notable.")

German forces cut off from their comrades south of Metz were falling back on the city, and the 5th Infantry was bearing down on Pommerieux, only seven miles from the outskirts.

(Boston Herald-N. Y. Times Wireless)

PARIS, Nov. 11—Six divisions of the Third American Army have broken through German rear guards holding the approaches to the Saar and Metz and have cut the main enemy railroad and highway communications with Metz in a day of swift, sure advances.

Attacking on a 20-mile front, Lt. Gen. George S. Patton's tanks and infantry smashed from three to five miles eastward to cut the Metz-Saarebourg railroad, cross the Nied river and, striking up the railroad from Nancy, move to within four miles of the vital rail junction of Benestroff.

5 MILES FROM CITY

At the same time, infantry pushing north on Metz and its ring of nine forts advanced to within five miles of the city.

The Germans are getting out as fast as they can. Troops of the 110th and 111th Panzer Grenadier regiments of the 11th Panzer division are withdrawing from the forest of Chateau Salins under a hail of American shells and bombs while 51 guns have been knocked out or captured in the forest of Gremency.

The main German forces have not yet been encountered but there is every sign that the covering forces left by Field Marshal Johannes von Blaskowitz to screen the Maginot line have been broken and are now withdrawing onto the line itself.

The Third Army had captured 2440 German prisoners up to midnight last night. The number points to the small number of German troops left to guard areas.

DIVISIONS NAMED

The Four and Sixth American armored divisions are spearheading a drive east of the Seille river and the 26th, 35th, 80th and Fifth Infantry divisions are fighting in the same area. Further north the 90th and 95th divisions are fighting around Metz and to the north of the fortress.

The two German divisions thus far identified are among the best enemy units on that sector, the 11th Panzer division, two of whose panzer grenadier regiments have been encountered in the Chateau Salins forest, and the 17th SS Panzer Grenadier Division. Both were in action in Normandy, where the 17th fought at Carentan and the 11th between Caen and Caumont.

PATTON'S ARMY DRIVES AHEAD—Arrows show where American forces advanced yesterday, north and south of Metz. To the north the Yanks plunged beyond Koenigsmacher and made slight gains in the Mazieres area. Southwest of Metz, U. American Spearhead Establishes Three Bridgeheads

By WILLIAM FRYE
 LONDON (AP)—U. S. Third Army tanks, spearheading forward five miles yesterday in a drive cutting behind Metz, crossed the Nied river, severed the rail line to Sarrebourg and bit within 19 miles of Germany's Saar border.

Tanks of the Sixth Armored Division led the plunge through the German flank southeast of Metz, crossing the Nied and rolling through the town of Han-Sur-Nied, 13 miles from the fortress city of Metz.

Third Army troops drove deeper toward Metz on two sides in yesterday's advances. The deepest penetrations had carried at least 14 miles in four days from the jump-off line, and well beyond the 1918 Armistice Day battle-line.

Berlin declared 600 tanks were engaged in the offensive.

These units had advanced 5½ miles beyond Delme ridge in 24 hours. Six miles to the northwest, men of the Sixth Armored Division entered Luppy, three miles from the rail line.

Other doughboys drove nearly seven miles north of captured Chateau Salins to Haboudange, 24 miles southeast of Metz, and 20 miles from the Saar.

SET UP 3 BRIDGEHEADS

North of Metz, another Third Army prong pushed slowly eastward from Mazieres, occupying a woods about four miles above Metz. It was about 16 miles from the nearest columns battering into the German flank southeast of that fortress city.

Still farther north, Third Army troops had established three bridgeheads over the Moselle river Gains south and east of Koenigsmacher in the Moselle bridgehead 19 miles north of Metz were reported by the Allied communique, as well as small advances in the area of Maizières-les-Metz, 4½ miles north of Metz.

HALT COUNTER DRIVE

In the Aachen sector inside Germany, where infantry of the American First Army has been trying to breach the approaches to Cologne with a limited attack in the Hurtgen forest area, a German counterattack was thrown back.

Extensive minefields were encountered by the Yanks attempting to drive the fiercely resisting Germans out of their dug-in positions around Hurtgen. West of Schmidt, however, limited progress was reported as the Americans continued mopping up enemy pillboxes.

Yanks Storm Metz Take Second Fort

By J. EDWARD MURRAY

PARIS, Nov. 14 (UP)—Fort Yser, the second of nine great forts girdling Metz, fell today to American troops driving up from the south through bone-chilling rain to within 3½ miles of Metz while other units launched a frontal assault four miles west of the city.

METZ WEDGE DEEPENED

A regimental combat team of the Fifth Division of Lt.-Gen. George S. Patton's Third Army smashed northward from Verny through the village of Orny and on about a mile northwest to seize the Yser fortress group.

Earlier front dispatches identified the captured fort only as a major one in the Orny area, and headquarters sources subsequently identified it by name as Fort Yser.

As Maj.-Gen. Stafford L. Irwin's assault forces drove the wedge deeper into the Metz fortifications, other Third Army troops battered forward against sporadic counter-thrusts all along the line.

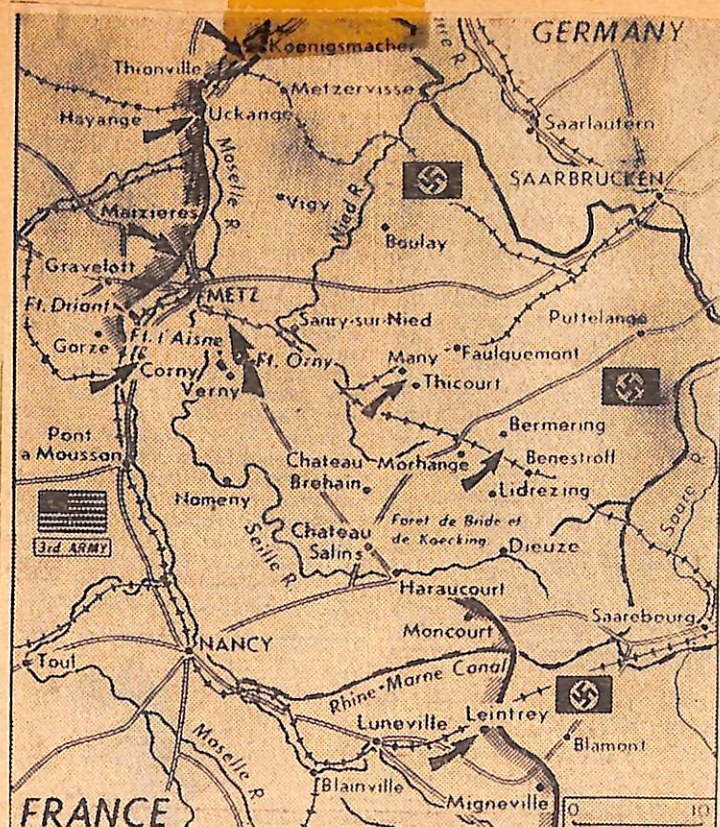

The Doubhboys were advancing in driving rain and over soggy fields that clogged their boots and the treads of their vehicles. They had neither sufficient aerial support nor artillery observation, since visibility was 100 yards.

Early reports did not say whether the Yanks encountered opposition at Fort Yser and its surrounding casemates. But there was speculation at headquarters that it fell as easily as L'Aisne in the Verny area to the south did yesterday, with the Nazis apparently falling back into the inner core of Metz defenses.

In a concerted action, Maj.-Gen. Harry Twaddle's 95th Infantry Division attacked the outer defenses in the area of Chatel St. Germain, about four miles west of Metz.

Early reports said they were Southeast of Metz the Germans attempted at least 15 small-scale counter-attacks, but in each case were thrown back to their initial positions. Tanks of the Sixth Armored Division operating in the Vittoncourt area 12 miles southeast of Metz gained a mile yesterday while the 26th Division advanced two miles on a six-mile front two miles north of Dieuze.

At Chateau Voué, 22 miles northeast of Nancy, the 26th Division not only repelled a counter-attack, but resumed the offensive itself and advanced two miles.

Lt.-Gen. Alexander M. Patch's American Seventh Army on the southern flank of the Third Army advanced as much as two miles in an intensified assault east of Lunéville, capturing Leintrey, just south of the Lunéville-Sarrebourg railway and within 16 miles southwest of Sarrebourg itself.

'Me and Ike' Individualists, Soft-Hatted Tully Proclaims

By ANDREW TULLY
Traveler Staff Correspondent

WITH THE 26TH DIVISION ON THE MOVE, Nov. 15 (Delayed)—"Me and Ike" is what I say after today.

I mean that while others may bow under regulations, 'me and Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower', supreme commander of the Allied Armies in the European theatre, go our sweet non-conforming way.

EVERYBODY ON TOES

I was sitting around the headquarters of the YD's Maj.-Gen. Willard S. Paul of Shrewsbury this afternoon when who should pop in but Ike. Everybody saluted and looked smart and I made a mental vow hereafter to shave every morning. But Ike made everybody comfortable by acting as if he wasn't supreme commander.

Then I got busy taking note of things so I could remember later what the supreme commander looked like on such a momentous occasion. By golly, I made the discovery of my life. Ike was not wearing a helmet. He had on a smart garrison cap just like mine, except that mine isn't smart.

PATTON FAVORS HELMETS

Well, sir, that's life. 'Me and Ike,' as it were, both up at the front and neither one of us wearing a helmet. Just a couple of individualists.

Funny thing about it is that Lt.-Gen. George S. Patton, Jr., the Third Army's commander, was there, too, and Gen. Patton is fussy about helmets; makes everybody wear one. So when Gen. Patton's around I generally try to hide my garrison cap behind me and then kind of back out of the door when I leave.

But that didn't bother Ike, at all, at all. He even kept his cap on all the while he talked to Gen. Paul and told him what a good job the 26th has been doing. That guy Ike is a brave man and don't let anybody kid you.

As for me, I'm happy. I'd been kind of worried since I came over here because unlike most correspondents I wasn't calling a single general, not even a brigadier, by his first name. In fact, I'd only met about three of them and they all seemed strangely unimpressed and definitely not inclined to ask my advice on tactical matters. Sort of a failure at this war corresponding, I figured.

But not after today. The other boys at press camp can have their little lunches with major generals and their three-minute chats with lieutenant-generals. Me? I've discovered a bond between me and the BIG boss.

West Roxbury Cantys Followers Of Andy Tully

One of Traveler correspondent Andrew Tully's faithful followers is J. Paul Canty of 12 Colbert street, West Roxbury. Two of his sons are with the 101st Infantry, 26th Regiment, in Germany, the famous Yankee Division which Tully is following.

There are six Canty boys and a sister who are in uniform now. In the South Pacific are three of the family, T/5 J. Paul Canty, Jr., a Commando with the U. S. Engineers, George D. Canty, storekeeper second class, and Charles A., seaman first class, the latter two both with the Navy. The youngest brother, also with the Navy, is on Atlantic duty, and Claire Marie Canty has just joined the Marine Corps Women's Reserve.

The Canty representatives with the Yankee Division are S/Sgt. Edward D. and Pvt. Henry F. Canty. Henry recently wrote home that his brother had received the Combat Infantryman Badge, and had been visited by Paul G. Kirk, former Massachusetts superior court judge, and now AMG commissioner. S/Sgt. Edward Canty was aide to Kirk when he was a colonel with the Yankee Division.

S/Sgt. Canty is married to the former Louise Hanley of Brighton and they have a baby daughter, Virginia.

Tragedy Hits Canty Family, One Fighting Son 'Missing'

A flood of congratulatory letters and calls came to Mr. and Mrs. J. Paul Canty of 12 Colbert street, West Roxbury, after the Traveler published an account of their six sons and a daughter in service. People were still phoning last night when a telegram came telling them their son Henry is missing in action.

Pfc. Henry F. and S/Sgt. Edward D. Canty are members of the Yankee Division, whose activities at home follow through articles by Traveler Correspondent Andrew Tully.

HUNDREDS OF LETTERS

"There were hundreds of letters," says Henry's father. "They came from Greenfield, Pittsfield, Worcester, Fall River, Fitchburg, from all over the state. Among the letters was a fine one from George R. Farnum of Boston, former assistant United States attorney-general, who wrote of the spirit of the American family that sent seven children to war."

A premonition of tragedy appeared between the lines of the last letter from Henry's brother, Eddie, also with the Yankee division. "Eddie wrote Oct. 31," his father says, "and for the first time he made no mention of his brother."

Henry, 25 years old and a graduate well known as an athlete before he and Eddie enlisted together on March 9, 1941. He was named All-Interscholastic pitcher after he of the Roslindale High School, was pitched Roslindale High School to the first championship in the history of suburban schools in 1937. He pitched for Frammouth in the Cape league, played baseball with independent teams, and won a New Hampshire golf championship.

Besides Henry and Eddie, with the 101st Infantry of the Yankee Division, there are five Cantys in service. In the Pacific are T-5 J. Paul, Jr., a Commando with the engineers, and George D., storekeeper second class, and Charles A. Canty, seaman first class, both with the Navy. The youngest brother in service is Bobby, 18, on Atlantic duty with the Navy. A sister, Claire Marie, has just joined the Marine Corps Women's Reserve.

One of 12 children, Henry also has two sisters living in Scituate, Mrs. Helen E. Keleher and Mrs. Mae F. Cusick; two others, Mrs. Harold Boynton of Roslindale, and Miss Joan Paula Canty, 13, a student at St. Thomas' parochial school, Jamaica Plain; and another brother, Harold of Winthrop, foreman in the state highway department.

3 More Metz Forts Fall as Patton's Men Advance

PARIS, Nov. 15 (UP)—American forces captured three more forts in a battering ram advance through the suburbs to within a little more than a mile of doomed Metz today, while the British 2d Army in Holland hurled the Germans back on their last defense line west of the Nazi frontier.

The German Transocean Agency, paving the way for the abandonment of Metz, said the evacuation of civilians from the fortress city began several days ago.

Altogether, four Allied armies were on the march to the east along the 275-mile snow-swept front line from Venlo in southeast Holland to the Belfort Gap through the Vosges Mountains in eastern France.

WITH THE 26TH DIVISION, 18 MILES FROM GERMANY, Nov. 20 (Delayed) — "Nobody ever writes anything about the artillery," the little sergeant told me as our jeep came to a stop in the muddy field where a battery of 105s was bellowing.

I suppose he's right. The average news story about front line activities generally either deals with an armored break through or the slow heartbreaking inch-by-inch advance of the dogged foot soldier. Maybe there'll be a paragraph or two about the artillery barrage which preceded the attack, but seldom is there a story based entirely on the man who rips a lanyard or takes a sight.

Yet our artillery is doing one of the most magnificent jobs of the war. Sure it's the armor that pierces the enemy lines and sure

END OF METZ BATTLE NEAR

"It appeared almost time to write 'finis' to the great battle of Metz," United Press Correspondent Robert Richards reported from the American front.

The German Transocean agency, paving the way for the abandonment of Metz, said the evacuation of civilians from the fortress city began several days ago.

Altogether, four Allied armies were on the march to the east along the 275-mile snow-swept front from Venlo in southeast Holland to the Belfort gap through the Vosges mountains in eastern France.

Nowhere was more than moderate resistance encountered. The Germans appeared to be withdrawing all along the line to conserve their dwindling manpower until they could fight along a line more to their liking, probably on the east bank of the Rhine.

Nazis Unable to Check Yanks Near Aachen

U. S. First Knives to Within 25 Miles of Rhine

LONDON, Nov. 18 (AP)—American 3d Army infantry entered the besieged French fortress city of Metz from both the north and south today and mechanized cavalry patrols 26 miles to the northeast punched into the Reich near Perl in the corner where the German, French and Luxembourg borders join.

These operations were two of a series of advances scored by Gen Dwight D. Eisenhower's six Allied armies driving toward the Rhine along the 400-mile western front.

On the 13-mile-wide front east and northeast of Aachen the Germans were unable to check the momentum of the massive drive by the American 1st and 9th Armies toward Cologne and the industrial Ruhr.

United States 1st Army units, slamming through a breach east of Stolberg, were reported to have driven through stubborn resistance to within 25 miles of the Rhine, but official secrecy blanketed detailed information from the front.

In the shadow of the Swiss Alps, French Colonials punched well into the 15-mile wide Belfort Gap and were within five miles of its narrowest part at Belfort.

The six Allied Armies, swelled to a fighting force of 1,250,000 men with a similar number in reserve, were attacking German lines believed held by less than 500,000 troops.

The Germans were putting up their stiffest fight against the American 1st and 9th Armies slugging their way for the third day toward the Roer River, the first natural barrier before the Rhine.

Fighter-bombers, supporting the ground operations on all sectors of the front, bombed and strafed the enemy from Duren in the Aachen area to Colmar and Mulhouse in the south.

At the northern end of the Allied line the British 2d Army in its sweep through the Maas River bulge in southeastern Holland established another bridgehead across the Zig Zag Canal, advanced its previous crossing and captured Beringen, 2½ miles southeast of Meijel. The British rapidly were developing a threat to the Dutch border city and communications hub of Venlo, nine miles to the east.

Farther south the British mopped up remaining pockets of enemy troops and completed their firm hold on the Maas front facing Roermond, like Venlo a getaway city to Germany, n

PARIS, Nov. 16 (UP)—Lt.-Gen. George S. Patton's American Third Army forces tightened their siege arc with a three-mile advance to within a mile and a half north of Metz today, but German counter-attacks south and west of the city drove other units from Peltre and Fort Hubert.

GAP CLOSING

(A British broadcast heard by CBS said American troops were within three-quarters of a mile of the outskirts of Metz.)

Though the counter-attacks wedged into their spearheads, the Americans were within a little more than a mile of Metz from the south and within a mile and a half to a mile and three-quarters from the fortress city from the west. The German gap east of Metz was reduced to six miles by other advances.

The setbacks were considered no more than temporary and the fall of Metz in battle for the first time in its history still was believed.

Patton's 'Free Press' Policy Vindicated Despite Critics

UBACH, Germany, Nov. 24 (AP)—Lt. Gen. George S. Patton's policy of a "free press" has been vindicated with the fall of Metz.

Last September the commander of the U. S. Third Army, after conferring with Gens. Eisenhower and George C. Marshall, ordered the name of every division, every unit and every commander on his front be released every day for publication.

It meant that if a certain division took a city, correspondents could say, for instance, that the 13th regiment from the 12th division commanded by John Doe had done the job.

Conservative commanders predicted dire results, but Patton's theory was that the men doing the fighting liked to read what their division had accomplished. He believed gains in morale more than offset the fact that the Germans learned which unit was where. Patton maintained the enemy acquired that knowledge anyway within 12 hours after a battle starts.

Some of you may not know, however, that your skill and gallantry in your first major engagements have won the respect and admiration of the whole Twelfth Corps, and even, I feel sure, of the German troops facing you.

Y.-D. Boys Ate Turkey With Truck Fenders for Tables

WITH THE UNITED STATES 3D ARMY, Nov. 23 (Delayed) (AP)—Damp, mud-stained soldiers in the United States 3d Army's forward areas got their turkey today, with practically all of the traditional trimmings, but with a minimum of ceremony.

Cpl Timmy Butters, 21 Market st., Plymouth, Mass., whose home is right in the cradle of Thanksgiving and 300 yards from the famous rock, gave this expert opinion on the dinner served up by the cooks of his company of 150th Engineers, attached to the 4th Armored Division: "This is plenty OK and we even have Cape Cod cranberries. I'm demolishing mine—and a second plate, too."

Pfc Theodore Lodi, another authority from 24 Cherry st., Plymouth, added, "These cooks of ours did a solid job—even if they aren't from Massachusetts."

Some soldiers used fenders of trucks as a festive board. Most dinners were at noontime, but one group of the 26th "Yankee" Division command post ate theirs at 2:30 p. m.

Lt Wesley Tresch of Bordentown,

N. J., explained, "This place was too hot for kitchens until just a little while ago, so they cooked the turkeys farther back and just brought them in."

Only the men actually fighting or in the foremost posts where hot meals could not be carried actually had to go without the traditional bird and most of them were to get theirs later in the day or tomorrow when relieved.

Many like Pfc George Harris, of 26 Montrose st., Somerville, Mass., ate their turkey beside foxholes dug in around their artillery positions.

The 26th Division won its nickname in World War I when it was almost a 100 percent New England outfit. Now it has many men from all parts of the nation but its 101st Regiment still is predominantly from Massachusetts. Its first battalion is commanded by Lt Col Lawrence Kirk, 27 Sargent st., Newton, Mass.

TURKEY

Kirk's battalion had fought its way into Lohr and pushed two companies across a small stream and into Insviller, a mile beyond Lohr. But the stream which normally is about 40 feet wide was swollen to 70 or more and so deep the men had to swim it with their equipment.

An ammunition platoon under Lt Sam Raymond (address unavailable) loaded a truck with doors, shutters and odd bits of lumber and drove back to the stream.

Using two poles as a base and nailing the shutters atop them, Raymond and his platoon built a foot-bridge across which some ammunition was passed by a human chain and hand-carried to the front.

Then Raymond's crew improvised a wooden vehicle bridge.

"It was pretty hot there and one shell which the artillery said was a 210-mm went right through the bridge, but didn't explode until it was under the water. That saved us. Others landed in the thick mud and that seemed to help us, too, blanketing the explosion," Raymond said.

Enough jeeps rolled across to supply the isolated companies and avert a withdrawal, which already had been actually ordered.

Through it all the young supply officer shuttled busily back and forth between Lohr and Insviller while both towns were being pestered almost continuously by artillery and many good soldiers were spending most of the time in cellars.

Up Against "Tanglefoot" Tactics Captures 54 Towns in 50 Days; 2000 Nazi Dead; 1930 Prisoners

By CARLYLE HOLT

WITH THE 26TH DIVISION, 3D ARMY, Nov. 28—Yesterday this Division completed 50 days' combat service, and 18 during the current offensive of the 3d United States Army. In that time, the Division has advanced a maximum of 25 miles and has generally pushed its front forward about 20 miles. It has faced three German divisions, two of infantry and one panzer. These divisions have been badly cut up and the panzer division nearly destroyed.

In the last 50 days, the Division has captured 54 French towns, not including those localities described by Russians as inhabited places. It has also taken 1930 prisoners, and official estimates place German dead at another 2000.

The official commendation sent by Maj Gen M. S. Eddy, commander of the 12th Corps, must already have been published in Boston. This commendation proves that the 26th has won its place among the hard-bitten infantry outfits of our Armies, without any loss of time in doing so. Better proof of the fighting quality of this Division is the fact that more than 200 of its members have been cited for decorations, including four distinguished service crosses, 145 bronze stars, 37 silver stars and three soldiers' medals.

Casualties Heavy

Casualties have not been light. Describing the drive of this division without the aid of a map is difficult, because, to understand it, you need to see how woods and hills are located and how, by changing direction here and there, a division kept flanking the Germans out of positions which would have been costly to attack frontally.

A FRONT LINE COMMAND POST IN FRANCE, Nov. 29 (Delayed).—When you get up as far as a company command post you stop, because the only thing up ahead is the enemy. You've already gone through the division and regimental and battalion command posts and it is at best a kind of naked feeling to know that you've reached the farthest advance of an outfit's formal outposts.

PATROL ACTIVITY

Most of the business of Company I of the Division's 101st Regiment was patrol activity today. However, as our jeep labored in the mud of a winding road through apple orchards and dwarf vineyards and into the little town where the company was camped I heard only occasional firing. Off to our right in a little draw made of the meeting of two low hills some Yank tanks banged spasmodically. The anti-tank guns set up to cover the town and a bridge leading into it seemed almost unnecessary in an atmosphere of such comparative calm.

Another battery of 105's was set up in an orchard just off the road to our left at the edge of the town and we stopped to pass the time of day with the lounging gunners. There were 10 Bay Staters in the group, engaged in a variety of little tasks from brewing coffee in a huge tin can over an open fire to sewing a rip in a pair of pants.

Germans Thought We Were Digging In for Winter

By ANNE O'HARE McCORMICK

By Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 17—The winter offensive in the west gains weight, stride and shape as four American armies, flanked by the British in the north and the French in the south, strike together on a front extending from the lowlands of Holland to the icy passes of the Vosges.

Not for eighty years, say the weathermen on this side of the line, has winter fallen so early and so harshly on the gray horizons of northern Europe. Never, it is certain, have so many millions of people shivered in unheated houses. And they are the fortunate ones. The number of bombed out, shelled out and evacuated who have no houses at all is beyond count on a Continent which is an almost uninterrupted battlefield. For the civilian population of every country, freed or not, this is physically the worst winter of the war. This bleak fact the liberated cannot and the liberators dare not forget. It colors the political atmosphere in France, Italy, Belgium and Holland. Even in Britain the ever-growing problem of the homeless casts a long shadow on the "Long Parliament." Human misery and dislocation beyond the power of the victors to relieve cut across political plans and complicate military strategy to an extent undreamed of in the United States.

Nazis Hoped for a Lull

To the civilian who has had a glimpse of life on the firing line, however, the news that the long-planned offensive is in motion on every sector brings thoughts only of the men at the front who have to brave at the same time the hardest of winters and the most desperate of Germans. The enemy didn't think they'd do it. Until less than a fortnight ago, when the Third Army launched the spearhead of the general attack, the Germans believed carefully spread reports that the Allied armies were digging in for the winter. The enemy was digging in too. The infantry slogging through the glue-like mud under the dripping skies of Lorraine have captured dugouts in the hills weather-proofed and fitted up for a long stay. At every point the battlefield gives striking evidence that the Germans staked all they have left on the chance that the winter's lull in fighting might turn up something in their favor—a crack in the Allied political front, a rift among the armies, a kink in the lengthening supply line, a change in leadership, any accident that might save them from total defeat and total occupation. The Nazis cannot believe even yet that the western powers desire the Russians to win and the Germans to lose.

We Like to Get Going

There will be no winter's lull. Two weeks ago the operation that has resulted in the encirclement of all but a narrow outlet of the great fortress of Metz was only a plan on a map. But final preparations to move around this "impregnable point" and draw the enemy out were completed, and now that the whole front is in movement it is clear to everybody, including the surprised and hitherto uncertain Germans, that the thrust of the Third Army in Lorraine was the opening blow in a general offensive.

It was clear then to anybody who breathed the tense air at Third Army headquarters. The American soldier is not a man to stick in the mud. His first impulse is to plow through and get going. This reporter will never forget the expressions on the faces of young officers of the Twenty-sixth Division who stood in a waterlogged field in biting wind listening to General Patton's "last words" as they prepared to go into battle. They were the leaders of green troops lacking in the toughening experience of units of the Thirty-fifth and Eightieth Divisions, with whom they formed the spearhead of the advance, but in their eyes was a look of understanding and purpose of soldiers who fight to the end because they hate war.

The Picturesque Patton

Nobody needs to be told that General Patton is a profane and picturesque speaker. He addressed the officers of three divisions at widely separated points of the front that day—once in a field, once in a barn and once in what was the paneled drawing room of a battered old chateau. Between times he conferred with his generals and stopped on the roads to talk to GI's filing ruts or MP's patrolling temporary bridges. His language in every case was what was expected of him, yet so full of military sense that the jeep driver, who eagerly listened in, kept saying, "That's the stuff. The Old Man is a hundred per cent right."

In his own Army and on the front generally Patton is a legendary figure who lives up to his legend. He boasts of his knowledge of history and can describe great campaigns of the past as vividly as if he'd been there. He quotes poetry, his own and others, to fit any occasion. He is religious and blasphemous, hard-boiled, hot-tempered and so chockful of sentiment that he cannot read a citation to one of his men with dry eyes. He wears his pearl-handled pistols, continues to live in a windowless house the Germans are constantly aiming at and is always "the best dressed general" with the conscious and disarming bravado of the actor who sticks to the character he has created. It is easy to see that this character is extremely popular with the generals as well as the men of his divisions. The GI's tell you with pride that the Third Army is tops because its motto is "everything for the soldier."

PRAYER

ALMIGHTY and most merciful Father, we humbly beseech Thee, of Thy great goodness, to restrain these immoderate rains with which we have had to contend. Grant us fair weather for Battle. Graciously hearken to us as soldiers who call upon Thee that armed with Thy power, we may advance from victory to victory, and crush the oppression and wickedness of our enemies, and establish Thy justice among men and nations. Amen.

A PRAYER AND A GREETING formed the message on Christmas cards which Lt.-Gen. George S. Patton, Jr., sent to the officers and men of the Third U. S. Army under his command. A copy of the card reproduced above shows the face with the traditional Christmas wish and an expression of confidence in the courage, skill and devotion of his men. 26th Division Fights Way Into Saare Union

PARIS, Dec. 2 (AP)—American troops entered two anchor points of the main defenses of the German Reich today—flaming Saarlautern, important Saar Basin industrial city into which they penetrated deeply, and Julich, where they drove into the outlying part of the town on the western side of the River Roer.

At both Saarlautern and Julich, the Americans face river barriers. Julich, key point to the Cologne plain, lies mainly on the eastern side of the Roer. Across the Saar from Saarlautern, burning from aerial assaults, Siegfried Line positions were dented by other air bombardments.

In the terrific battle on the edge of the Cologne plain, the United States 1st Army at Inden and the United States 9th Army at Julich were encountering the heaviest opposition of the Winter offensive.

United States 7th Army troops wiped out the last remnants of the German bridgehead at the approaches to the now demolished Rhine bridges in Strasbourg.

Saarlautern in Flames

Following attacks by nearly 250 medium and light United States 9th Air Force bombers which left Saarlautern in flames and tore open nearby Siegfried Line defenses, 3d Army Doughboys entered the Saar city at two points. The Americans then fanned out over most of that part of the city which lies west of the Saar River. The 90th and 95th Divisions, with elements of the 10th Armored Division screening them to the north, now hold a 14-mile stretch along the Saar between Merzig and Saarlautern. The vital Saar Basin has been gouged deeply by 3d Army advances, but the river still is a barrier to the greater part of this heavily industrial region. The Germans apparently hope to make a strong stand along this natural line.

YANK DIVISION SMASHES INTO SARRE UNION

OUTSIDE SAARLAUTERN, Germany (AP)—Most of the old Saar city of Saarlautern was overwhelmed yesterday by the 95th Infantry Division in the first gouging of Hitler's cities in the industrial basin.

The Americans entered from the west as great fires burned from an aerial bombardment, and now are almost through all Saarlautern lying west of the Saar river.

I watched infantry men fighting in Pikard, a half mile outside the city. Armored tank destroyers moved alongside, blasting strong-points. The infantry moved in from two directions.

The drive, which carried three miles almost to the Saar river, was made quickly after heavy preliminary bombing and shelling. Nearly 250 medium bombers and 300 fighter bombers paced the assault.

The Americans came under sporadically heavy artillery fire, presumably from the Siegfried line positions, but the Germans inside the city made few death stands.

The 95th's 379 Regiment added to laurels won at Metz by spearheading the way into Saarlautern. The 377th Regiment overcame stubborn resistance in a three-quarter mile advance beyond Altforweiler, three miles southwest of Saarlautern.

On the north the 90th Division's 357th Regiment edged ahead a half-mile to Rehlingen, four and a half miles southeast of Merzig, putting American infantrymen and tanks on or near the Saar facing the Siegfried defenses along an 11-mile stretch.

To the southeast, the 26th

(Yankee) Infantry Division fought into the French industrial city of Sarre Union, 12 miles south of the Saar border, while elements of the Fourth Armored Division advanced to a point a mile and a half due east of there.

Four miles east of Sarre Union, the Germans after being beaten back in one pre-dawn attack in the Mackwiller area threw in 40 to 50 tanks and a large force of infantry, forcing American armored units to withdraw from the town.

WITH 26th DIVISION, 3d ARMY, Dec. 2—This division has completed 50 days of combat service, 18 during the current offensive of the 3d United States Army. In that time the division has advanced a maximum of 25 miles and has generally pushed its front forward about 20 miles. It has faced three German divisions, two of infantry and one panzer. These divisions have been badly cut up and the panzer division nearly destroyed.

In the past 50 days the division has captured 54 French towns. It has also taken 1980 prisoners and official estimates place German dead at 2000.

Proof of the fighting quality of this division is the fact that more than 200 of its members were cited for decorations, including four Distinguished Service Crosses, 145 Bronze Stars, 37 Silver Stars and three Soldiers' Medals. Casualties have not been light.

Infantry units taking part in this offensive included the 101st, 104th and 328th.

PARIS, Dec. 4 (UP)—American forces hammering at the gates of Germany's greatest arsenal zones hacked out strategic gains toward the Ruhr and Rhineland today and tightened their grip on a springboard into the Saar at ruined and almost conquered Saarlautern.

BATTLE IN JULICH

United States Ninth Army troops battled bloodily through the streets of Julich, bastion of the Roer River line blocking the way to both the Ruhr and Rhenish. While First Army units to their right straightened their line preparatory to a frontal assault on Duren.

To the south, the American Third Army, massed along the Saar river on a solid front of 16 miles and the first forces to cross the barrier to the industrially rich Saar basin, were beating down the dwindling pockets of resistance in the eastern part of Saarlautern.

(A Blue Network broadcast from Paris said Julich was "entirely in American hands," which would mean the Roer had been crossed.)

PREWAR VIEW OF THE SAAR RIVER in the vicinity of Mettlach. United States 3d Army troops have reached the Saar along a front from Hilbringer, four miles south of Mettlach, south to Saarlautern.

PARIS, Dec. 5 (AP)—The 3d Army virtually completed the capture of Saarlautern today and pushed a mile through the satellite towns of Roden and Fraulautern to the north in the thick outer crust of the shell-heaving Siegfried line.

American eight-inch artillery bombarded Saarbrücken from barely six miles away, the nearby French rail city of Forbach and the border town of Saareguemines while five divisions of Lt Gen George S. Patton's Army beat violently forward through the last bit of Lorraine toward the Saar, production center of German guns and steel.

Patton's bridgehead on the east bank of the looping Saar was widened to at least a mile and a half. His forces were on the river all the way to Merzig, 16 miles above Saarlautern, and executing a classical wheeling movement of his right and center as far southeast as Sarre Union. One mixed cavalry and infantry team advanced 4 miles inside Germany, south of Saarlautern.

PARIS, Dec. 7 (AP)—American tanks drove within 3½ miles of seered Saarbrücken today in a plunge to the outskirts of Forbach, French rail town and outpost of the Siegfried line. Maj Gen Paul Willard's 26th Infantry, the "Old Yankee Division," took Herbitzheim, six miles south of Sarreguemines, and entered Etting, seven miles southeast.

Artillery of the 3d Army bombarded the Little Pittsburgh of the coal and iron region for the eighth consecutive day, while infantry was cleaning the Germans from the last streets of Sarreguemines, French border town southeast of the Saar capital. Street fighting continued in Saarlautern, second city of the Saar.

22 miles.

On the static Roer River front, the Cologne plain for the second successive night was bright with strings of German ground lights, suggesting that the enemy was working intensively to prepare defenses on the Erft River in anticipation of a forced withdrawal from the swift and swollen Roer.

The Erft flows within eight miles of Cologne. It is 100 feet wide and paralleled by a canal. Along the Roer, the American 1st and 9th Armies were no closer than 22 miles from the ravaged metropolis on the Rhine. Nowhere had the Roer been crossed, but the GIs were up to its banks on a wide front.

Patton Ideal Leader for U.S. 3d Army

By ANDREW TULLY

(Traveler Staff Correspondent)

WITH THIRD ARMY TROOPS IN FRANCE, Dec. 8—He is a tall man, but not spare; rather, he gives the appearance of bulkiness, especially in his spotless, cream-colored trench coat lashed to his body with taut belt. His face is florid and the teeth in the straight, thin-lipped mouth are large, with little spaces between them. It is not a handsome face, but it is striking in its curious hint of austerity. It also is a strong face, with only a touch of softness under the deep, blue eyes. His hair is white, all white; it still covers the big head generously, but it is beginning to thin.

PATTON

His name is Patton.

Once he slapped a wounded soldier and, although it was not his way and never will be, he made amends naturally and automatically when commanded to do so by his superior officer. Today, you prefer to think of him as the leader of a fabulous body of men known as the Third United States Army.

Some people say that Patton's Third Army won the battle of France. That is an extravagant claim because the Third Army was not alone in France and, indeed, did not begin to fight until two months almost to the day after D Day. But if it could be said of any army that it won the battle of France, that army would be the Third United States Army. For the record of this army is far and above the most successful and the most spectacular and fabulous of any army fighting in Europe.

The Third Army became operational in an apple orchard in Normandy on Aug. 1. By the early part of September it had swept more than 600 miles across France, liberated Paris in all but the technical viewpoint, captured the fortress city of Verdun while still on the dead run and had drawn up before Metz, the last powerful city barrier to Germany. By Thanksgiving Day it was in Germany, 700 miles from its starting point on the Cherbourg peninsula four months earlier.

This man Patton took over command of the Third Army in England last April without benefit of publicity. He was in the dog house for the slapping incident and for a second unfortunate occurrence—his alleged statement in a speech in England that after the war America and Britain should rule the world. But his boss, Gen. Eisenhower, thought this man could do a job that needed doing. So, he gave Patton the Third Army, told him to keep his mouth shut, and wished him good luck.

Keeping his mouth shut, Patton brought his Third Army to France. It left England on the Fourth of July and after lying off Cherbourg until the 6th it went into bivouac in an apple orchard near Nehou, Normandy. It was a mysterious ghost-like army. No one could write even that it existed. During the nearly month-long blackout, Third Army correspondents wrote about First Army activities, writhing as they watched their copy go 60 long miles by courier to the First Army press camp for censoring and transmission.

The German radio shouted that Patton was leading Yanks in action on the Cherbourg peninsula, even named the divisions he supposedly commanded. The Third Army sat and waited.

It waited until noon of Aug. 1 and then with a complement consisting of the 8th, 12th and 15th corps it began to fight. Patton led his men south through the Cherbourg peninsula to St. Malo, at which point the 8th corps detached itself and drove west into the Brittany peninsula toward Brest, Lorient, Nantes and St. Nazaire. The 20th corps joined up at about this time.

The break-through from the Normandy peninsula came and the Third Army really began to move. Paris fell to a French division Aug. 25 after the Third Army had been ordered to bypass it on the north and south. Third Army correspondents hurried to Paris with the First Army to report the capital's liberation. The Third Army didn't wait for them.

CROSSED SIX RIVERS

Even as cheering Parisians greeted the Yanks of the First Army entering the city, the 20th corps was before Verdun, more than 100 miles east of the capital. A few days later Verdun fell. En route and in between times the Third Army had taken Chateau Thierry and Belleau Wood, had roared through the Argonne forest in as many minutes as it took days in 1918 and had crossed six rivers—the Seine, Yonne, Marne, Oise, Besle and Meuse.

After Verdun there was no more gasoline. Patton's supply lines couldn't keep up his pace and military men still argue that no supply system yet devised could have done so. But that is beside the point, of course. For while Patton's men waited for gas the Germans re-trenched and dug in, re-occupied Metz after once having evacuated the city and generally got their breath.

When Patton and his men were ready to move again the Germans were rested and tougher. They also had their backs against their own frontier, so it took the Third Army until two weeks ago to take Metz and to effect the bloody crossings of the Moselle and Meurthe rivers. But the drive had impetus enough to send Yank doughboys across the border into Germany on a 30-mile front, and to add another river crossing to the Third's brilliant record—the crossing of the Sarre.

They did all this because they are and were the Third Army and only the combined efforts of many men can do such magnificent things. But no men anywhere can do such things regardless of their own courage and sacrifices without brilliant leadership. This man Patton, the gaudy, flamboyant, rough and tough general with his pearl-handled pistols—gave them that leadership. Whether one likes it or not that is the cold, hard, unassailable fact behind the success of the Third Army.

Lt.-Gen. George S. Patton, Jr., is one thing surely—he is a good soldier, perhaps even a great one. He is a hard fighter who knows how to wage war and he is rough, very rough with his country's enemies.

ABSIE, the American broadcasting station in Europe, heard by the Blue Network, said the Third was 15 miles inside Germany at this point.

The Seventh Army, coming up hard on the Third's right flank, broadened its battle lines in northern Lorraine to 35 miles. Advance forces entered Enchenberg, seven miles from the Saar border southeast of Saarbrücken and close to the old Maginot line fortifications.

As the winter offensive's first month ended with 700 square miles of Germany in Allied hands, the U. S. army sent patrols stabbing to the formidable Cologne plain barrier of the Roer River in the forefront of three new attacks on the stream's defenses.

There were indications the Germans may be preparing to fall back almost to the Rhine for a new stand, but they apparently were flooding the Roer by breaching dams somewhere upstream to make any drive across the swollen river even more difficult.

American intruder pilots saw floodlights blazing for the second straight night on roads and fields near the Erft River, five to eight miles from the Rhine, suggesting the enemy realized the Roer defenses were about to crack and was building new ones farther back.

Lieutenant-General George S. Patton's Third Army tanks in a two and a half-mile advance probed into the French city of Forbach and kept Saarbrücken's busy factories under artillery fire for the eighth consecutive day. Smoke could be seen boiling up over Saarbrücken.

Tighten Ring

The 90th Division made the deepest Third Army penetration into Germany by pushing a mile into the forests less than three miles northwest of Saarlautern.

The Fifth Division, tightening the ring about Saarbrücken, was but four and a half miles west of the city after entering Furstenthausen. Another task force cracked into Grand Roselle, six miles southwest of Saarbrücken.

Eight miles to the southeast the 35th Infantry Division mopped up two-thirds of the French city of Sarreguemines lying on the west bank of the Saar.

Sarreguemines, third largest of the Saar Valley cities, stands on the border at the southern gateway to the Saar, but the Germans withdrawing to the Siegfried Line blew all five bridges over the Saar there.

YD Captures Etting

The 26th (YD) Infantry Division, which crossed the Saar farther upstream, was beating up the eastern bank, however, and captured Etting, seven miles southeast of Sarreguemines. It was in position to outflank the one-third of Sarreguemines on that side of the river.

The Germans have concentrated armor on that sensitive sector, and American tanks locked with the enemy east of Etting in wooded country, knocking out 10 of 40 German tanks which spearheaded a counterblow.

Eight miles east of Etting, elements of the U. S. Seventh Army jumped into the battle for the Saar and the adjacent German province of the Palatinate.

They seized high ground overlooking Lemberg, only three miles from the southern Maginot fort town of Bitche and eight and a half miles from the Saar border. In this drive they occupied the nearby village of St. Louis-les-Bitche.

Stout Defense

Farther east, a strong German counterattack paced by heavy artillery bombardment drove the Americans from the northeast half of Mertzwiller, five and a half miles northwest of the enemy base of Haguenau.

The Germans were putting up a stout defense for their last positions in northern Lorraine, and the Seventh Army beat back another counterattack near Niederbronn, seven miles south of the Palatinate border.

The Germans anchored their stand around the French Maginot fortifications and were believed to be manning from 35 to 40 miles of the line.

The last bits of Alsace appeared to be slipping from Germany's grasp as the Seventh Army drove to within four miles north of Colmar, last Alsatian city in enemy hands, after overrunning four towns and villages, including Ostheim.

PARIS, Dec. 7 (AP)—The outer defense works of Germany's arsenal of Saarbrücken shook today from U. S. Third Army tank assaults on the outpost of Forbach—three and a half miles southwest—and the Seventh Army joined the drive on the Saar Basin with attacks along a 35-mile front.

The Third Army, forging ahead despite the mud and rain, welded its Saarlautern bridgehead solidly with one on the south, while a third bridgehead on the north was extended into the woods of Pachtener-Buchwald, slashing across the railway from Saarlautern to the fortress of Merzig.

This wedge into the Siegfried Line defenses, hammered out by the 90th Division, was eight miles inside Germany—the deepest penetration into the Reich by Third Army forces.

Resistance Bitter As Hodges, French Also Smash Ahead

PARIS, Dec. 9 (AP)—U. S. Third Army troops slugged deeper into the Siegfried line fortifications around the Saar basin today while other Allied armies on the western front continued their slow progress against desperate opposition.

The stubborn German resistance along the entire front, the Allied supreme command said, cost the enemy the equivalent of 17 divisions in the first three weeks of the current winter offensive.

There was heavy fighting all along the Third Army line.

The 26th Division cracked the old Maginot line, now part of the Siegfried defenses, near Achen, seven miles southeast of Sarreguemines, and joined the 35th Division on the east bank of the Saar river for a drive from the south on the rich Saarland, already under attack from the west.

The Fifth Division, operating south of Saarlautern, continued its advance and reached the junction of the Saar and Roselle rivers.

Part of the 35th which crossed at Sarreguemines pushed on north into Neunkirsch, less than half a mile from the Saar basin's frontier in the forefront of a potential enveloping drive against the Saar's capital of Saarbrücken, eight miles northwest.

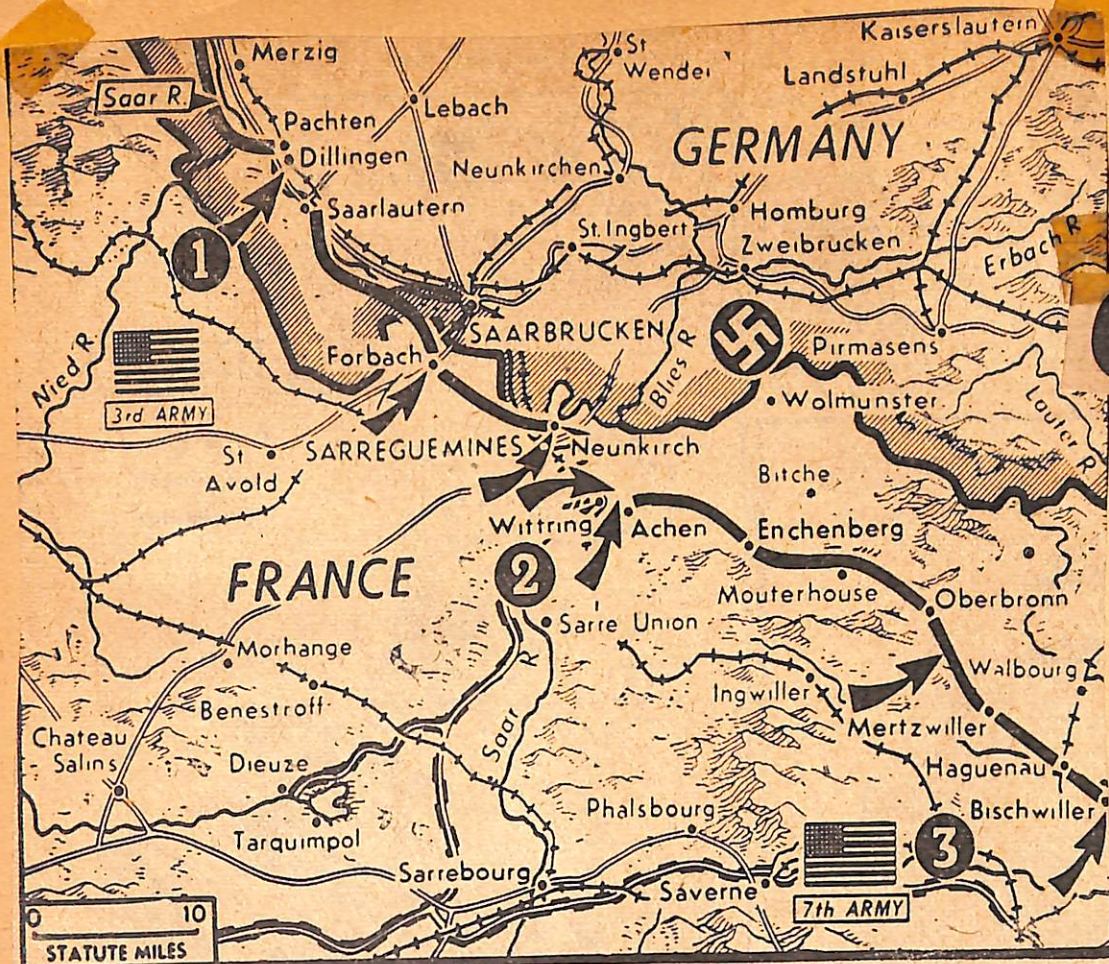

The Sixth Armored Division wiped out an enemy salient three miles deep and two miles wide located five miles southeast of Saarbrücken.

WITH THE 26th DIVISION ON THE MAGINOT LINE, Dec. 8—Nearing the finish line after covering the greatest distance of any Third Army outfit in the race to the German border which started exactly a month ago, the Yankee Division today drove to within four and one-half miles of the frontier.

From an observation post high on a naked hill within 1000 yards of the front lines I watched YD artillery tanks and infantry batter at the last Maginot Line forts barring their way to German soil.

LIKE A MOVIE SCENE

The whole action was spread out before me like a scene from a motion picture. Through binoculars I could see four medium Yank tanks pulled up in a hilltop field pouring direct fire into forts and pillboxes commanding the ground.

The closely clustered towns of Witting to the north, Haut Poirier in the middle and Aachen to the south and over the low hills and down into sharply falling valleys of these Vosges foothills which make of the country one huge hobnailed landscape. The 104th and 328th Infantry Regiments were sending the foot soldiers needed to take this ground and hold it.

Advancing in a storm of fire, the 104th, commanded by Lt. Col. Ralph Ralladino of Somerville, had all but taken Aachen. Its grimy riflemen and mortar squads were swarming all over the streets of the town locked in virtual point-blank combat. With withdrawing German forces still battered by our artillery and with smaller arms fire rattling in the high wind, the town gave forth handfuls of those little puffs of white smoke which are the unmistakable evidence of a bastion in the throes of battle.

MOVING ON FORT

Those little figures off to the front of us emerging cautiously from a little patch of woods were the men of the 328th moving toward the fort of Witting and Haut Poirier. The first attackers started up the big jelly roll hill, which screened the Witting fort and others fanned out toward the center of the panorama down into a narrow forest and then up again, up the gradual slope of the "middle" hill.

U. S. Armor Wipes Out Saarbrücken Salient

PARIS, Dec. 9 (AP)—A United States 3d Army division broke through a remaining German-held segment of the old French Maginot line today and joined another division east of the Saar River for a concerted drive from the south on industrial Saarland—already invaded and hotly beset from the west.

The 26th Division, which cracked the fortified line near Aachen, seven miles southeast of Sarreguemines, plowed ahead up to two miles and met the 35th, which was expanding three crossings on the east bank of the Saar just below the German border.

Part of the 35th which crossed at Sarreguemines pushed on north into Neunkirsch, less than half a mile from the Saar Basin's frontier in the forefront of a potential enveloping drive against the Saar's capital of Saarbrücken, eight miles northwest.

There was heavy fighting on the whole 3d Army front. Other Allied armies on the Western Front continued slow progress against desperate opposition.

The 26th Division was the first to cross the Saar, breaking across last month some 17 miles south of Sarreguemines, and since then has been beating up the east bank. It ran into stiff resistance at Aachen, where it came up against the old French fortifications for the first time.

The United States 7th Army kept the Allied Winter offensive rolling all the way east to the Rhine with attacks northwest of Hagenau within four miles of Germany and was hacking at the approaches to Hagenau itself. The city is the most important enemy base left in Northern Alsace.

Snow Blankets Front

Snow blanketed the northern front, where the United States 9th Army smashed the last two German pockets on the Roer at Julich, and the United States 1st Army edged closer to the river some 18 miles south of Julich near Bergstein.

The Supreme Command, surveying the first three weeks of the offensive ending Nov. 30, claimed destruction of the equivalent of 17 German divisions, a rate of attrition which in theory would destroy the enemy's whole front line Army well before the end of Winter.

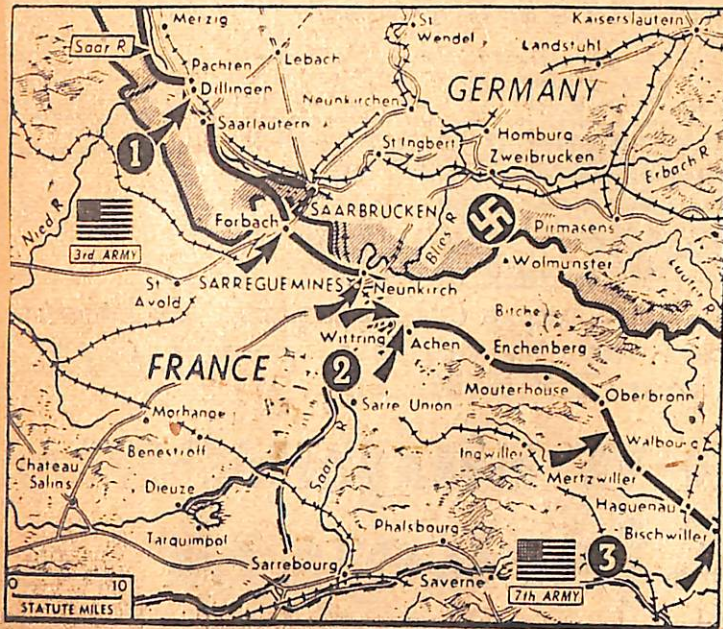

With the British and Canadians in Holland and the United States 1st and 9th Armies at the edge of the Cologne plain stabilized for the moment by weather and flooded river barriers, action centered on the fronts of the United States 3d and 7th and French 1st Armies.

ALLIED HEADQUARTERS (AP)—U. S. Third Army troops slugged deeper into the Siegfried Line fortifications around the Saar basin yesterday while other Allied armies on the western front continued their slow progress against desperate opposition.

The stubborn German resistance along the entire front, the Allied command said, cost the enemy the equivalent of 17 divisions in the first three weeks of the current winter offensive.

There was heavy fighting all along the Third Army line. CONTINUES ADVANCE

The 26th (Yankee) Division cracked the Maginot line defenses near Aachen, seven miles southeast of Barregumines, which the Germans had converted to their own use, and joined the 35th Division on the east banks of the Saar river for a drive from the south on the rich Saarland, already under attack from the west.

The Fifth Division, operating south of Saarlautern, continued its advance and reached the junction of the Saar and Roselle rivers.

Part of the 35th which crossed at Sarreguemines pushed on north into Neunkirch, less than half a mile from the Saar basin's frontier in the forefront of a potential enveloping drive against the Saar's capital of Saarbrücken, eight miles northwest.

The Sixth Armored Division wiped out an enemy salient three miles deep and two miles wide located five miles southeast of Saarbrücken.

within four miles of Germany and was hacking at the approaches to Hagenau itself. The city is the most important enemy base left in northern Alsace.

Snow blanketed the northern front, where the U. S. Ninth Army smashed the last two German pockets on the Roer at Julich, and the U. S. First Army edged closer to the river some 18 miles south of Julich near Bergstein.

The Allied command, surveying the first three weeks of the offensive ending Nov. 30, claimed destruction of the equivalent of 17 German divisions, a rate of attrition which in theory would destroy the enemy's whole front line army well before the end of winter.

With the British and Canadians in Holland and the U. S. First and Seventh and French First armies at the edge of the Cologne plain stabilized for the moment by weather and flooded river barriers, action centered on the fronts of the U. S. Third and Ninth and French First armies.

Lt. Gen. Patton's Third Army 35th division pushed about a half mile east in extending to a mile its bridgeheads on the east bank of the Saar river at Sarreguemines and at Dieding and Wittling, three and five miles south-east.

Northwest of Saarlautern, the 90th Division knocked back a strong counterattack at Dillingen and knocked out 12 more pillboxes in a slow gouging into the Siegfried line, the last big barrier before the Rhine.

The German counterblow was made by 600 infantry and 11 tanks and fighting raged from house to house and wall to wall before the Germans gave up and withdrew from the city.

Fighting still was in progress inside Saarlautern, and a German force massing for a counterattack against the Saar bridgehead there was broken up by artillery fire. Both the 95th Division here and the 90th to the north were under heavy fire from the Siegfried line.

Lt. Gen. Patch's Seventh Army, using surprise tactics similar to the Third, fought into Bischwiller four and a half miles from the Rhine north of Strasbourg, jumping off before dawn in a double envelopment attack without artillery preparation.

BRIDGE SEIZED

The surprise enabled infantry to take intact a 100-foot bridge across the Moder river in the northeastern part of the town.

Once Bischwiller is cleared, the defense of Hagenau, four miles northeast, will be impossible. The Seventh holds more than a score of towns immediately south, west and northwest of the city.

Other Seventh Army troops nine miles northwest of Hagenau slashed to within four miles of the Palatinate border northwest of Niederbronn.

Other Seventh Army troops seized Bining, 10 miles southeast of Sarreguemines on one of the main roads leading to that city, and, slashing to within four miles of the Palatinate border, cleared the enemy from Niederbronn on the Alsatian plain.

Farther west, the Seventh dug deeper into heavily-wooded Eifel Pass, just south of the French fortress town of Bitch, seven miles south of the Saar border.

The French First Army, fighting out of Bonhomme Pass, was closing on the Alsatian city of Colmar, no more than four miles ahead of them.

Their progress was slowed by desperate German rearguards protecting the German withdrawal across the Rhine east of Colmar, where a temporary bridge at Neuf-Brisach was attacked by Allied warplanes.

On the snow-covered hills and forests at the edge of the Cologne plain, the Ninth Army drove the Germans across the Roer from their long-held positions in the swimming pool and stadium at Julich. Only patrol action was reported elsewhere.

Lt. Hodges' First Army Infantrymen found the going slow along the ridge-ribbed wooded countryside studded with camouflaged pillboxes southwest of Bergstein.

PARIS, Dec. 11 (AP)—First Army infantry and tanks advanced $1\frac{1}{4}$ miles today in fresh snowfall, driving the weakening but still determined Germans from the Roer Valley towns of Dhorn and Echtz, the latter $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles northwest of the brown ruins of Duren.

The main force of Lt Gen Courtney H. Hodges' drive was along a 10-mile front, more than six inches deep in snow, in the area west, northwest and southwest of Duren, a Roer River stronghold of 39,000 just 20 miles over open country from Cologne.

To the south, Lt Gen George S. Patton's 3d Army beat down counterattacks in the steel city of Dillingen and near Saarlautern and fought the severest kinds of battles from house-to-house in Sarreguemines, Roden and Fraulatern.

In a one-mile advance the 26th Division overran Gros Rederching, seven miles southeast of Sarreguemines and drove to within three miles of the Basin. The 26th Division captured an underground factory near Witting, five miles southeast of Sarreguemines.

The 35th and 26th Infantry Divisions of the 3d Army extended their lines in the center of the western front east of Sarreguemines, squeezing the Germans from some of the last bits of France in that sector.

YD Battles Stiff Panzer Defenses

Presses Its Drive In Rain and Mud

By ANDREW TULLY
(Traveler Staff Correspondent)

WITH THE 26TH DIVISION AT THE GERMAN BORDER, Dec. 11—Driving to within one-half mile of the German frontier in a miserable downpour of rain, the Yankee Division today encountered stiffened Panzer defenses.

The defenders, striving desperately to stall the advance at the

11th hour, threw tanks into what hitherto had been principally a battle between the infantry and artillery of both sides and for a time the progress of the 328th regiment was halted.

Countering with a heavy concentration of tank destroyers, the 328th was winning this battle of armor. But it was a slow and violent business. A total of 10 German tanks was knocked out by Yank TDs in a 24-hour period, but the defenders were sending additional armor into the fray. Every hour, meanwhile, enemy artillery on the high ground overlooking Obergailbach, virtually astride the border, was pounding our muddled foot soldiers unmercifully.

But the drive pressed on and on, taking a yard here and an entire field there, never relenting, always pushing and pushing in the terrible, blinding rain, and the soupy mud of this wretched country of hills and crests and valleys and gloomy forests.

In such fighting, men often did things not in the book of military tactics. They fought and helped where they were needed. Men like Capt. Earl Eaves, for instance.

Capt. Eaves is an infantry officer, but he spontaneously took charge of a tank destroyer unit in an earlier scrimmage.

The captain was leading a dough-foot advance when German 88's and flak guns threatened to hold up operations. Yankee tank destroyers were on the scene, but were hampered by poor visibility. So Capt. Eaves walked alongside the TD completely buttoned up and signaled directions by hammering on the sides of the tanks with his pistol butt. The TD silenced the enemy guns and the advance continued.

And after driving more than 60 miles from the Nancy outskirts, the Yankee Division now could shoot a rifle bullet into the Fatherland.

YDs Yell for Kelly When There's Vital Message to Send

"Has anybody here seen Kelly?" has become a popular saying these days with men of the 26th Yankee Division in France whenever they want to get a message through to the front lines, according to an Allied dispatch received here yesterday from Europe.

Reason for Kelly's wide popularity is because PFC Francis C. Kelly, son of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas J. Kelly of Fisher ave., Roxbury, has made several successful but dangerous round trips from his command post to advancing units over roads constantly under enemy fire. He has always delivered his messages on time, and frequently they were instrumental in the success of subsequent attacks.

Kelly was awarded the Bronze Star Medal for heroism by order of Maj. Gen. Willard S. Paul, commanding the 26th Infantry Division.

Liquid Oxygen Factory Taken

The factory, composed of several large rooms set in a subterranean area 700 yards wide and one and one-half miles long, had employed as many as 1500 civilian workers impressed from the town of Witting nearby.

YD officers who talked to some of the ex-workers said they had no idea of what product was being turned out because of the secrecy which surrounded operations. No worker, they said, was permitted to view any more than his own operation; none was employed in any capacity other than a common laborer. When new machinery was installed it was handled by Nazi soldiers.

Maj. Henry Anderson of Nashville, executive officer of an engineer battalion of the 26th, and a chemical engineer, said the machinery was used for "liquefying gas of some sort, probably oxygen, for V1 and V2 robot bombs."

LONDON, Dec. 16—Londoners are busy shopping for Christmas but what they buy beats me. As everything I want takes coupons which I don't have, or too much money, Christmas shopping as far as I am concerned is a complete flop.

The attempt to forget the war is also a total failure. Familiar faces are gone from London, and I don't know anybody here anymore. I am having a very poor time on this holiday, so I'm returning to the Continent as soon as I can get there.

I find lots of odd notes in my notebook:

I met Lt. Edgar S. Seavey of 28 Knight st., Dorchester with a 90th Division Reconnaissance troop, 3rd Army, some weeks ago, and he showed me the picture of his wife.

He has it attached to the handle of his pistol under a piece of plexiglass which he has riveted to the handle. His troop was involved in an episode during the retreat of the Germans from Metz during which they successfully shot up and dispersed a long column of vehicles, taking more than 300 prisoners and destroying numerous vehicles. My notes being considerably smeared with mud, I can't make out how many. Anyway, Lt. Seavey was in first class condition when I saw him.

So was T4 Vincent J. Cornell of Swampscot, radio operator with the same troop. Cornell was highly recommended for his work in coordinating the attack of the reconnaissance platoon against the column as he handled all the messages during the attack.

When the 26th Division went into the line in October there were three men who had been with the division in the last war. Now one is dead, one is badly wounded, and one was all right on Nov. 27.

Mac, Magic Mess Man, Awarded Bronze Star

WESTERN FRONT, WITH 26TH DIVISION, Dec. 29 (Delayed)—When T Sgt John D. McLaughlin of 308 Lowell st., Somerville, the Division Headquarters' mess sergeant, walked out of the cook shack today he was wearing the ribbon of the Bronze Star—something new since the last time I had seen him. "He pinned it on me himself," he said, grinning proudly, referring to Maj Gen W. S. Paul, division commander, who had conferred the decoration several days before.

The story was told me later by a staff officer.

Everybody at Division Headquarters considers Mac the best mess sergeant in the Army. Anybody who has ever eaten at Division Headquarters is likely to agree.

"Mac is a magician," said the officer. He produces hot, well-cooked food every day, even when we are on the move. What he got the Bronze Star for was doing such a magnificent job, day in and day out, under all sorts of handicaps. Nobody has had to worry about food, and nobody has been refused. But we like to kid Mac that he got the star just for serving the General his soup every day.

Dec. 29, 1944

At the Luxembourg-German frontier (1), the Third Army regained Echternach, which for the first time was disclosed to have been lost earlier to the Germans, and took Berdorf and Beaufort. In one of several crossings of the Sauer River the Americans captured Liefrange (2). The corridor to Bastogne (3) was not only held against an enemy attack in the Sibret area but also widened by drives to the outskirts of Surre and northwest of Sainlez. At the nose of the salient our troops were operating against German patrols east of Beauraing, and in the Verre area two forces joined to trap Nazi units (4). Patton's Third Army Sent In Record Time to Halt Foe

By The Associated Press.

WITH UNITED STATES THIRD ARMY, Dec. 28—Lieut. Gen. George S. Patton has hurled his Third Army infantry and tanks at German break-through forces in what may well be the war's decisive battle. Three days after Field Marshal Gen. Karl von Rundstedt launched his "last-effort" offensive on Dec. 16 against the United States First Army's sector along the Belgian-Luxembourg frontier, the Third Army commander received the job of stemming the enemy drive.

The pistol-packin' general went into action at once. Quickly he surveyed the situation, made his decision and in record time men and armor were rolling in a swelling tide toward the critical front. Marshal von Rundstedt's thrust, evidently aimed at a break-through against the most thinly held sector of the Western Front admittedly caught the Allied Command off guard.

But the task of countering him was a ready-made one for General Patton, an old cavalry hand who now is considered the world's foremost tank expert. Even before his own order of battle was worked out, General Patton was asked how soon he would be ready to strike. He answered in typical Patton fashion.

"It almost knocked me out of my chair," one staff officer said.

The selection of General Patton to meet the German challenge carried tremendous responsibility. It was a task requiring a speedy shuffling of troops, which General Patton accomplished swiftly and expertly. Furthermore, it gave him an opportunity for the resumption of the big-scale operations that accompanied his sweep across France.

The restless three-star general who exploited Lieut. Gen. Omar Bradley's break-through at St. Lo and helped engineer the Falaise gap, which chewed the Seventh German Army to pieces, now is waging the kind of war that is to his own liking.

Bored in Beyond Bastogne

PARIS, Dec. 28 (U.P.)—General Patton's troops, ordered to divert pressure from the First Army break-through area, went into action five days ago on a line running from east to west through Arlon, twenty-two miles south of Bastogne. The Third Army armor hurled itself into the German spearhead after moving into the line at racing pace.

In a twenty-two-mile advance, General Patton freed the heroic American garrison at Bastogne and at last report he was still boring in on a thirty-five-mile front.

The Nineteenth Tactical Air Force Thunderbolts of Brig. Gen. Otto Weyland provided the aerial cover for General Patton's spearheads.

Troops Thrilled by Order

WITH THE AMERICAN ARMY, Dec. 20 (Delayed) (U.P.)—Lieut. Gen. George S. Patton, using the steel fist of his powerful armored divisions, hurled his Third Army against the counter-driving Germans today a few hours after he had been ordered to the relief of the embattled American forces on his left. He hit the enemy line north of Luxembourg City.

General Patton received his orders this morning. He drew up his battle plans and, as this dispatch is written at noon, he is carrying them out, committed to one of the big jobs of his career. Third Army troops are pushing northward in a steady stream.

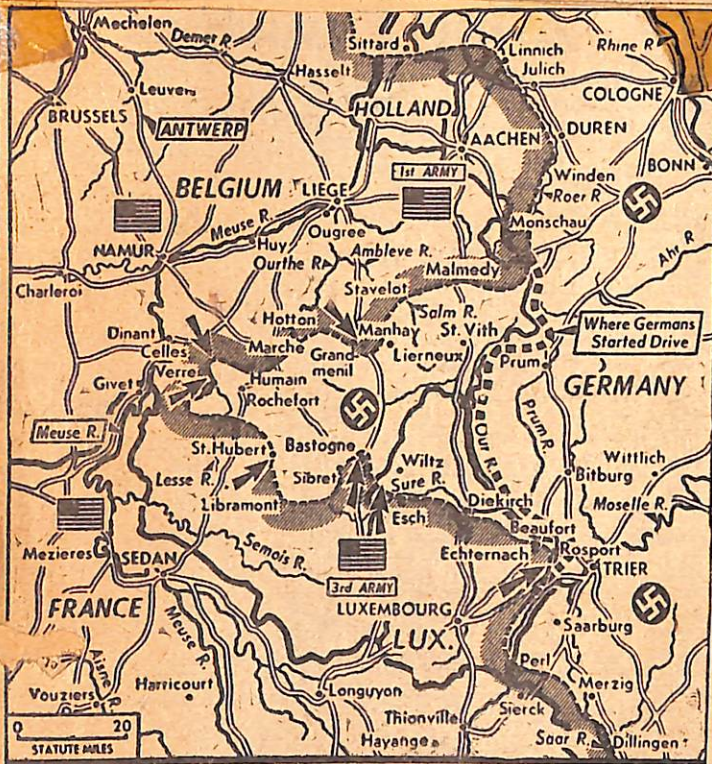

The same electric thrill that swept through the ranks from private up as the Third Army raced through France on its mission of liberation inspired the troops again today. Their pride was evident that "the Old Man" had been called on to turn back the Germans.

PARIS, Dec. 29 (UP) — The American First and Third Armies drove deep into the northern and southern flanks of the German salient today and were within less than 15 miles of the junction in a developing counter-offensive that threatened to turn the Ardennes into a gigantic death pocket for tens of thousands of crack Nazi troops.

HUNS FORCED BACK 10 MILES

The Associated Press reported that von Rundstedt's offensive had been kicked into reverse by American forces which slammed into all three sides of his extended bulge, with Lt.-Gen. George S. Meeting the Challenge

Patton Right In His Element

By EDWARD D. BALL

BASTOGNE, Dec. 28 (Delayed). Lt.-Gen. George S. Patton, Jr., now is waging a kind of war that is to his own liking.

Three days after Field Marshal Karl von Rundstedt launched his offensive, Dec. 16, along the Belgian-Luxembourg frontier, the United States Third Army commander was waging the job of stemming the tide.

His men and armor were rolling in a swelling tide toward the critical front.

RELIEVED GARRISON

One of his objectives was to relieve the besieged garrison here in this strategic road hub. He did.

Bastogne now is a shambles, but it still is firmly in American hands.

His hard-hitting men and armor advanced up to 16 miles in six days along an east-to-west front extending from the Luxembourg-German border to west of Bastogne.

They lifted a threat to the city of Luxembourg by pounding the Germans back 2 to 14 miles after they had speared within 13 miles of the duchy's capital.

They reached Bastogne through a corridor that narrowed to only one mile as it entered the town, but widened at its base to three miles.

The task of countering von Rundstedt was a ready-made one for Patton, an old cavalry hand who now is considered the world's foremost tank expert.

Meeting the German challenge required a speedy shuffling of troops. Patton accomplished this swiftly and expertly.

In Bastogne, bulldozers had to clear the streets. Litter squads lifted the dead from the ruins.

Von Rundstedt threw all he could against Bastogne, but he failed.

Today there were some 200 destroyed German tanks lying in and about the town, hundreds of dead and more hundreds of German prisoners in cages.

Von Rundstedt definitely has lost the first round of what may well be the war's decisive battle. He lost it to American fighting men who did not know what it was to surrender; men who fought on rationed ammunition and scant food until Patton's Third Army broke the ring about Bastogne with spectacular aid from our air forces.

(A Berlin broadcast said the hold-out garrison consisted of the 101st Airborne, the Tenth Armored and the "last remnants" of the 28th Infantry Division.)

To name the heroes of Bastogne would be to call the entire roll of officers and men who stood off the Germans. In facing and squaring this first serious American reverse since Bataan they were all heroes.

BULLETINS (Latest)

PARIS, Jan. 2 (UP)—Supreme Headquarters said today that the German attack in the Bitch area of France had gained a mile and a half and was continuing, with enemy forces now active all the way from Bitch to the Rhine.

PARIS, Jan. 2 (UP)—Infantry of the 26th Division have thrown back a flanking attack by some 500 Germans above Lutrebois, just south of Bastogne, and have gone over to the attack, slugging back several hundred yards through the enemy lines.

By J. EDWARD MURRAY

PARIS, Jan. 2 (UP)—The Germans were reported pulling out of the western half of the Ardennes salient at top speed today as American Third Army forces crushed at Nazi counter-attack on Bastogne and wheeled northward into the sagging enemy flank on a front of more than 15 miles. CONTACT WITH ARMOR LOST

A field dispatch timed at 8 o'clock this morning (3 A. M., E. W. T.) said all contact had been lost with the Nazi armored divisions that had been holding the western tip of the salient and that the Americans were advancing eastward against light rear guard resistance.

United Press War Correspondent Boyd Lewis reported the German withdrawal, which apparently ended for the time being Field Marshal Karl von Rundstedt's threat to the Meuse river line.

The high command said strong forces of the Third Army failed to achieve an intended break-through "in the direction of Houffalize," 10 miles north of Bastogne on the Liege highway.

Apparently alarmed by the growing threat of Lt.-Gen. George S. Patton's Third Army assault on their southern flank, the Nazis were believed gathering their crack Panzer units in the center of the Ardennes in preparation for a new attempt to break through the American ring—perhaps north toward Liege and Antwerp or south against Patton's troops.

PUNCH BACK 12 MILES

Lewis' censored dispatch did not specify the location of the American forces advancing against the nose of the German salient. The Yank counter-drive at last reports, now more than 36 hours old, had punched back some 12 miles from positions only four miles east of the Meuse to recapture Rochefort, 24 miles northwest of Bastogne.

Coincident with the reported German withdrawal in the Ardennes, supreme headquarters announced a sudden flare-up of enemy activity on both sides of the focal battleground.

Nazi patrols stabbed aggressively at the American and British lines to the north, while considerably stronger enemy forces counter-attacked on the United States Seventh Army front along the Rhine plain in a pattern very similar to the opening stage of the Ardennes offensive.

United Press War Correspondent Clinton B. Conger reported that the Germans threw in several attacks of battalion strength, some 800 to 900 men each, against the Seventh Army lines around Bitch, Sunday night, and were continuing their onslaught with increasing force early yesterday.

SEVENTH PUSHED BACK

There was no further indication of the scope or intent of the new thrust, which succeeded in pushing back the Seventh Army lines slightly on a front of about 12 miles.

Headquarters spokesmen declined to speculate whether the new assault was a diversion to weaken Patton's drive in the Ardennes or the beginning of a full-scale offensive to split the Third and Seventh Army front.

Meanwhile, the SHAEF communique and field dispatches from Patton's attack front—all delayed 24 to 36 hours by censorship—said the Third Army was grinding steadily into the southern flank of the Ardennes salient on a broadening front north, east and west of Bastogne.

Veterans of the American Ninth Armored Division gave the Nazis a resounding beating in the wooded hills southeast of Bastogne New Year's eve, halting a powerful armored force that tried repeatedly to cut the supply corridor below that town and isolate Patton's advanced spearheads to the north.

Attacking all day Sunday and through the night, the Germans had gained about 200 yards in the Lutrebois sector three miles southeast of Bastogne at a cost of 67 tanks.

Thirty-two of the Nazi Panzers were wrecked in a tremendous battle with the Ninth Division's tanks, tank destroyers and bazooka gunners, and another 35 were blasted by American dive bombers and rocket-firing fighters.

26TH DIV. SLUGS BACK

Simultaneously, the Germans hurled some 500 infantrymen into a flanking attack on American positions above Lutrebois, only to be thrown back on that sector by doughboys of the 26th Division, mostly New Englanders. The 26th went over to the attack early today and slugged back several hundred yards through the enemy lines, Lewis reported.

Still closer to Bastogne, an American armored column drove three miles eastward to take the crossroads hamlet of Warden, strengthening the eastern wall of the Bastogne corridor.

Other German units in apparently smaller force were reported striking futilely against the western side of the corridor from the Sibret area, four miles southwest of Bastogne. By Sunday morning these units had succeeded in gaining as much as a mile, but their threat was negated by American advances to the north and west.

On that flank, Patton's armored and infantry divisions all but eliminated the danger to Bastogne by shoving their line almost abreast of the town on a 15-mile front extending westward to the St. Hubert area.

The American offensive spearheads were crowding steadily forward, by-passing relatively strong German resistance areas around Sibret and Lutrebois to be dealt with by the main forces moving up in their wake.

YANKS RETAKE REMAGNE

Senochamps, Chenogne and Houmont, two to five miles west-southwest of Bastogne, were captured by the Americans, while nine miles to the west they retook Remagne after losing the town to a German counter-attack Sunday.

The Nazis recaptured Moirey, 1½ miles northwest of Remagne, after three days of furious fighting, but other American units outflanked that position on the east and west by driving to within 1½ miles of Tillet and about the same distance south of St. Hubert.

Headquarters spokesmen and heavily-censored field dispatches were vague about the progress of Patton's central column striking directly northward into the German flank above Bastogne.

At last reports the Americans had driven a deep wedge into the German lines well north of Longchamps, five miles above Bastogne, indicating they were only a dozen miles or less from a juncture with American First Army forces below Manhay on the northern wall of the salient.

It was the threat of that juncture that appeared to have prompted the German decision to pull back their most advanced Panzer spearheads at the western tip of the salient.

Farther east of Bastogne, the Third Army continued to make slow progress in the rugged Luxembourg hill country below Wiltz. German counter-attacks were beaten off in the Nothum area, two miles southwest of that highway town, and heavy fighting was reported under way just south of Wiltz.

Threat of the U. S. Third Army's assault, now a mile and a half wide at its spearhead, was reported today forcing the enemy to withdraw from the tip of its bulge into the Ardennes Forest, according to a United Press field dispatch filed this morning. break through to Liege or Antwerp or to turn again on Patton.

Enemy pressure was continuing on many parts of the front, most heavily in the Belgian area. Above Lutrebois, just south of Bastogne, some 500 Nazis made a flank attack on 26th Division positions, only to be thrown back. YD troops today went over to the attack themselves and pushed several hundred yards through the enemy lines. East of Bastogne, around Nothum, German counter-attacks were beaten off and there was heavy fighting at Wiltz in the Luxembourg hills.

At the north British and Canadians hurled back German self-propelled guns which had been ferried across the Mass. The U. S. Seventh Army was engaged in heavy fighting around Bitch, with the enemy attacking in battalion strength, possibly the beginning of a new offensive.

Headquarters was silent on an enemy claim of wiping out the U. S. 106th Infantry Division in Belgium.

WITH THE TWENTY-SIXTH DIVISION IN LUXEMBOURG, Jan. 5—This is the first of three stories on the important part New England's Yankee Division played in stopping the recent German counter attack in Luxembourg.

This is a big story. It is the story of the big thing that was done by the men of the Twenty-Sixth Infantry Division. It is the story magnificent achievement that have come out of this war.

Putting it "simply and without embellishment," they did this: They rushed 60 miles to the underside of the counter-attack east of Arlon, Belgium. They stopped the Germans in their sector, which was what they had been ordered to do at any cost, then they did a more magnificent job. They smashed the German attackers back into a retreat that saved the important Belgian city of Bastogne from capture by the enemy.

Probably no one can say what would have happened if Bastogne had fallen, but it would have been bad, very bad indeed. Bastogne is an important supply center and road net terminal. Inside the city was the valiant 101st Airborne Division, which was starting an epic defensive stand. The city's fall would have been a serious blow, perhaps even a disastrous blow to the Allies.

MERRIWELL TWIST

And it was the Twenty-sixth Division called to the rescue in a veritable Frank Merriwell twist which saved Bastogne, for when the YD sent the Germans in its own sector reeling, enemy forces harassing the Fourth Armored Division on the Twenty-sixth's left flank had to retreat too to avoid being flanked. And thus the pressure on the Fourth Armored was relieved, permitting its tanks to roll forward to the north and break the siege of Bastogne.

The YD did this big thing because it was fast and because it fought furiously and without letup. It left its area at dawn on Dec. 20 and its first units drew up around Arlon that night. It attacked on December 22 and since that day it has pushed its assault day and night without cease. Up until today it has advanced 17 miles into the Jerry midriff. That is 17 miles as the crow flies. Actually the YD traveled many more miles than that on icy roads which wind around miniature peaks like the frosting on a birthday cake.

It seems a long time ago now to that night when the YD got the summons to move. The men of the Twenty Sixth were resting a little that night, resting and relaxing. In the building where the officers were billeted they had set up a little night spot dubbed the "Wolfs Den." Some Red Cross girls had come over. Among them was a round-faced, smiling girl named Mary Small from Cohasset and the officers were dancing and drinking mild wine. Even the big brass was there. Maj. Gen. Willard S. Paul of Shrewsbury, the division commanding officer, and Col. Bernice A. McFadyen, the chief of staff, sat at a corner table.

WANTED ON PHONE

About 10 o'clock an aide poked his head cautiously into the room looked around and then walked over to the table where Gen. Paul and Col. McFadyen sat and saluted smartly. The big brass grinned. "At ease son," Gen. Paul told the aide. "Yes, sir, the chief is wanted on the phone, sir," the aide said as if saying one long word.

Col. McFadyen excused himself, of how this division was called upon suddenly in a crisis and how it did the thing that could and may be written into the history of this war as the major reason why the German counter attack of Dec. 18, 1944 met ultimate failure.

WAS BLACKED OUT

It is only now almost three weeks after the men of the YD flung themselves into that awful breach that the whole story can be told. For a while during the early stages of the operation the Twenty-Sixth was blacked out. It could not be identified in print.

Later that blackout was lifted. But the story still could not be told because it was not a complete story. Yet now it is complete and there is not a gram of stale material in this late telling of it. For this big thing that the men of the 26th did among the snow-covered hills and angry gorges of Luxembourg is one of the few stories of truly way of knowing the whys and wherefores of this order. His thoughts go no further than the present period.

SAVED BASTOGNE

Thus when the Twenty-Sixth Division attacked the German bulge in Luxembourg on Dec. 22, the kid clutching his rifle or manning a mortar would have been absent-mindedly interested but not impressed by word that he was beginning a struggle to save the important Belgian city of Bastogne from capture by the German coun-terattackers. Bastogne was somewhere off to the northwest; somebody had said the Fourth Armored was trying to get up there. The men of the Twenty-Sixth were vague about it all. But they knew their attack was headed well to the east of the beleaguered city.

Yet, when these Yankee Division troops drove the Germans out of their sector, they saved Bastogne, saved it by relieving the pressure on the Fourth Armored Division so that outfit could push north and chase the Krauts away from the city.

It was cold and raw in the darkness of early morning when the YD attacked. The snow which was to fall in varying quantities every day thereafter was still only a threat, but the beautiful stands of fir trees and broad, rolling meadowlands of the Duchy of Luxembourg were wrapped in heavy, bonewetting mists. For awhile, the men's teeth chattered in the black cold, then their movements and the excitement over what lay ahead warmed their bodies and made them sweat.

101ST IN RESERVE

The 328th regiment was on the left, the 104th on the right, with the 101st in reserve. Cautiously, the patrols probed along the seven-mile front; almost at once they made contact with the enemy. Against the steady banging of artillery the "crack crack" of small arms fire and the rattle of machine guns bit through the air.

There was a good element of surprise in the thing. German troops had been moving west when the 26th hit them; they now had to turn to face a full scale attack in a sector where they had been only vaguely aware of the presence of Yank forces. Consequently, the YD's forward progress was slowed only slightly at first; it moved ahead steadily all that day and all that night to gain a good seven miles before the Jerries could gather sufficient strength to exchange blows properly with their assailants. By then the advance had netted the 104th the high ground commanding the town of Vic Grosbous; the 328th had secured Hostert Les Folschette.

DAY AND NIGHT BATTLE

The ground was getting hillier, the roads beginning to curve precariously around cruel crests falling into deep gorges. A light snow almost like a fog, began to fall

The Twenty-Sixth pushed on. This was a day and night business until further notice.

South of Grosbous, a storybook hamlet clinging to the side of a cruller-shaped hill, a neck of snow-speckled evergreens barred the attackers' path. The main force by-passed it, sending companies E and I of the 104th Regiment to turn it

The companies, commanded by Capt. Frank Spiegelberger of St. Paul, Minn., and Lt. Al O'Connor of Pittsfield, worked a day and night on those woods, cautiously but ruthlessly raking it with machine gun, mortar and small arms fire. When it was all over, they took 190 prisoners from those woods and counted many more dead on the fresh white snow under the tall trees.

On the YD's left flank meanwhile the Fourth Armored was being fiercely counter-attacked. The YD was ordered to take over a portion of the Fourth's zone up to and including the town of Rambrouch, and immediately sent a reconnaissance troop up there to keep the Jerries busy. The recon troop got through to the high ground overlooking Rambrouch and ran into stiff resistance, blocking and delaying the enemy troops, withdrawing in favor of the second battalion of the 101st regiment, commanded by Maj. J. Burton Stetson of East Weymouth, whose mission was to take the town.

RAMBROUCH FALLS

It took another day and a night before Rambrouch fell, but Maj. Stetson's Doughboys took it. With the town, they took a good number of prisoners, members of Volksgrenadier and paratrooper outfits. The YD then took over more of the Fourth Armored's zone. The Fourth was beginning to get its breath now.

It was snowing all the time, it seemed; yet little of the snow seemed to cling to the ground. The whole mountainous countryside was cloaked in the whiteness of a thick, powdery fog, however; and the YD began to encounter German troops dressed in white fresh from the Russian front, it learned from prisoners.

In such a setting, the Yankee Division now found itself with two major battles on its hands, the battles for the important towns of Arsdorf and Eschdorf. Arsdorf controlled the flank roads, Eschdorf the approaches to the Sure river, which wriggled its way across the entire YD front.

The first battalion of the 328th regiment, commanded by Maj. Bill Callanan of East Boston, the ex-state trooper, went after Arsdorf. It fought its way through the Forest Darsdorf, a black, gloomy patch of towering firs, then struggled a full day against blazing mortar and machine gun fire to take the high ground above the town.

Even then, the stubborn Nazi resistance refused to withdraw. Bill Callanan's outfit went into Arsdorf hamlet clinging to the side of a literally inch by inch and then found a furious street by street, house by house battle on their hands. Through the remaining hours of daylight, Yank Doughboys fought hand to hand with the rugged enemy, in the middle of streets and against stone walls and in dark corridors which were swept continuously by heavy fire. In one house alone, the first battalion knocked out 15 machine pistols and two 20 millimeter rapid fire anti-aircraft guns.

PRIMITIVE COMBAT

One rangy youngster, looking like a Vermont farmer striding across his fields, ambled from doorway to doorway, felling surprised Nazis with rights to the jaw. Others bludgeoned Jerry heads with rifle butts and pistol barrels. Backs creaked and necks snapped back in the fury of the primitive combat.

The street fighting in Arsdorf went on all night. The next morning, the 101st's second battalion, commanded by East Weymouth's Maj. Stetson, moved in from newly captured Bildorf and helped the 328th finally to make Arsdorf ours. Reports began to seep in of slow German withdrawals to the left, where the Fourth was seeking to break away to reach Bastogne.

A task force commanded by Lt. Col. Paul Hamilton of San Antonio, Tex., began the smash at Eschdorf. 1535 feet above sea level Col. Hamilton, the regular commander of the 328th, had a hard striking force composed of the motorized second battalion, an engineer section, a section of anti-aircraft artillery company, less one platoon of the 755 tank battalion and a platoon of the 818th tank destroyer battalion. He needed it.

Newtonite Defied River and Nazis

Sgt. Yerardi Volunteered to Scout Crossing for 101st on Way to Bastogne

By ANDREW TULLY
(Traveler Staff Correspondent)

WITH THE 26TH DIVISION IN LUXEMBOURG, Jan. 9—This is the last of three stories on how the Yankee Division saved the important city of Bastogne from capture during the recent German counter-attack in Belgium and Luxembourg.

NOT A BIG RIVER

The Sure river is not a big river. It is not especially wide and it hasn't the sudden depths of rivers like the Moselle and the Saar. But it is a swift river, very swift, and it runs through a series of gorges cut into a landscape that looks like a miniature of an Alpine countryside. Now, after taking Eschdorf and Arsdorf, the path to the Sure lay open to the 26th Division. But it was a path that lay over a cruel system of peaks and ridges, over roads that executed hairpin turns on the brink of precipices, in a sector coated with a thin, glassy mixture of ice and snow.

The YD soldiers standing atop one of these ridges looked down and across at a beautiful piece of the world. But because he had to fight his way across that gorgeous panorama, it was frightening, too. Actually, nobody stopped to look. The day and night attack schedule was still being sustained and the YD got its breath on the run after before the Pope made his appearance. His entry was heralded by the blowing of trumpets. Though as yet we couldn't see him we knew he was approaching by the tremendous ovation he received as he passed down the basilica blessing the throng. The applause was very surprising to us, but it was explained that the Italians see him so seldom that every time he makes a public appearance they applaud as he passes by.

COLORFUL GUARDS

"As he came down the basilica the mob behind us started to push and I thought that I would pass out. The procession was not too long. First in it were the Swiss guards, dressed in many kinds of uniforms; some wore black and orange outfits, others wore red still others wore black. All wore helmets, some with red plumes and some white. Most of the guards were adorned with medals that sparkled when the lights hit them just right.

"The Pope was carried in on his gestatorial chair, which is gold and upholstered in rich red velvet. He had on a white skull-cap, white gown and red slippers. He wore his ring, which I think he always wears, and as he moved his hands in his blessings the diamonds sparkled with a brilliance like of which I have never seen. He looked very solemn and sad. Cardinals and priests also were in the procession.

"Before mounting the altar the Pope was assisted in putting on the necessary robes and other accessories.

"A hush settled over the throng as the Pope began celebration of the low mass. I was impressed with the lack of articles that adorned the altar. There was little or nothing on it. There was a gold stand for the Bible which was bound in a gold and satin binding. It is the most beautiful book I have ever seen. The Pope had a gold pillow which he used whenever he knelt.

BRIGHTLY LIGHTED

"The lighting was very good. Spot lights were focused on the Pope as he stood on the altar. The huge church was brightly illuminated. The chalice from which the Pope drank was gold.

"Microphones were on the altar. ... The Sistine Choir, which is world famous, sang several hymns and it was very good and pleasing to the ear. The Allied troops also sang carols throughout the whole celebration. All in all, the first mass lasted about 45 minutes. ...

"For everyone who managed to get into St. Peter's, there were three or four who didn't get inside."

the battles for Arsdorf and Eschdorf.

Even as Eschdorf was falling, the third battalion of the 104th Regiment was swung wide to the right and sent streaming through forest lands down to the village of Heiderscheidergrund, just this side of the Sure. There it made contact with elements of the 80th Division, which has been cut off at the river bank, and relieved the pressure on these elements.

BRIDGE BLOWN UP

They found the bridge over the river at the point blown, and began to look for a place to ford the stream.

All the YD outfits swept toward the Sure now. The 1st battalion of the 328th regiment, commanded by Maj. Bill Callanan of East Boston, which had taken Arsdorf with the help of the 2d battalion of the 101st, headed for the river by unimproved back roads, struggling at times over a "road" that was little more than a cow-path. The rest of the 328th came down the almost sheer cliffs to the town of Bonnal, clambering up and down the peaks to rout out enemy snipers and machine-gun emplacements that pecked at them all the way. Before Bonnal was reached a YD soldier had climbed every peak in the sector to flush the last possible Nazi resister.

The 328th fought all one night to place fire on the river, in a scene that was something out of a storybook. Bitter cold had descended on the area, and the men suffered from frostbite and chills. The next morning the 101st passed through to relieve the tired 328th, and the stage was set for the crossing, in two places, of the Sure.

In between, however, the enemy threw its air at the struggling Yanks. In a roaring air-ground battle on the day after Christmas the 390th anti-aircraft battalion destroyed 15 hostile planes and claimed three other "possibles." Strafed and bombed and hammered by artillery, the Yanks kept their eyes on the Sure and continued their preparations for its crossing.

LIGHT SNOW FALLING

It was cold and a light snow was falling when a combat team of the 101st swung up before the Sure to try the crossing. Immediately it was met by a storm of enemy fire, and patrols were sent to probe up and down the river bank for a weak spot in the enemy defenses. A mile to the west they found the site they wanted.

A spearhead company —, composed of companies K and L — was moved up and rubber assault boats were carried to the bank and tied fast against the pull of the stream. Everything was set for the crossing—everything except the unknown quantity which was Jerry on the far side. Col. Scott of Washington, CO of the regiment, studied the far bank with glasses. Nothing stirred. No manmade noise could be heard above the sound of the rushing river.

The "Old Man" looked around him. He didn't say a word. He didn't have to—every one knew he was asking: "Who's going to be first?"

A chunky kid with a growth of beard shambled forward. His name is Sgt. Joseph Michael Yerardi of 34 River street, West Newton, and he is Col. Scott's bodyguard. His buddies shuffled uneasily. Yerardi reached for the automatic rifle of a nearby rifleman. "Well," he said softly, "Let's go."

PUSHES OFF IN BOAT

Then while the company lined the bank and covered the river with its weapons this boy laid the rifle on the bottom of the little rubber boat, looked around him slowly, let his own round bulk into the craft and pushed off into the torrent.

Still no noise. Still just the gurgle of water. Boys held their breath as the swift current carried the tiny craft 200 yards down the river, while Yerardi paddled furiously. He made it. Made it at last.

The boat crashing against the opposite bank made a loud noise and the boys tightened their fingers on triggers. Yerardi leaped out, stumbled on the slippery bank, then was up onto the top of it. His rifle poised for firing, he disappeared into the underbrush and the boys waited.

Twenty minutes later the chunk that was Yerardi suddenly appeared a few yards from where he had last been seen. He whistled, held up his hands—like a winning prizefighter. The bank was clear.

Before the day was over, not only this 101st combat team, but the first and second battalions of the 104th had crossed the Sure. And the next day the hardy engineers had two bridges across the stream. "Bridgehead secured," the message in the "action against the enemy" report said.

The German force holding up the Fourth Armored in its attempt to drive toward Bastogne, which was under heavy siege, fell back quickly. The Fourth Armored tanks began to speed and move north to break the siege of Bastogne. Line company men of the 26th infantry division ate rations in the dark, rolled themselves in their four blankets apiece and went to sleep in their snow foxholes.

Nobody knew then that the Yankee Division had saved Bastogne. All they cared about was that for the first time in more than a week they weren't going to fight at night. Tomorrow, they would push on, of course, push on to towns with names like Mecherdunkrodt, Kaufdorf and Bavigne, and the Sure would be far behind them. But tonight they were going to sleep.

In a town named Berlin, in Germany, supreme headquarters learned that the Bastogne affair was not going well.

eking to occupy Hierneck, the approach to the high ground overlooking Eschdorf, the task force ran into vigorous tank opposition. American tanks engaged the enemy armor, while the second battalion, commanded by Maj. Friedman of Bangor, Me., sought to filter through to Hierneck. Gunfire beat a steady boom against the hillsides as the ground before Hierneck became the scene first of a major tank battle then an infantry battle, then a little of both.

HAD ON WHITE SUITS

Decent observation was impossible in the midst of such fluid fighting. Early in the battle, Lt. Elmer Burke of Moscow, Pa., had gone ahead with a wire crew to establish an observation post on the high ground. Ten minutes later, the battalion command post phone jingled and Lt. Burke's voice told the officer who answered it that he and his crew were within 50 feet of enemy lines, pinned down by heavy machinegun fire. "I didn't see them at first because they've got on those damned white suits," Lt. Burke yelled. "Listen to 'em."

The officer listened, heard the rattle of the machineguns and then Burke's voice: "Hey, Fritz, you're a lousy shot. Why don't you give up?" Then the machine guns opened up again and Burke's chatter ceased. A few minutes later the lieutenant and his crew made their way back to the CP.

But the task force took Hierneck at last and pushed on to Eschdorf. In the van was company E, commanded by a raging German eater named Capt. Vaughn Swift of Manzanola, Colo. Capt. Swift managed to lead his outfit to the town's outskirts, where they were cut off and surrounded by enemy armor and infantry.

Crouching and dodging like a halfback, Swift darted through the center of the enemy fire in search of help. On his right flank, he found a group of friendly tanks. "Come on with me," he yelled hoarsely. "I've got a job for you." Then, clinging to the outside of the lead vehicle, he directed the tanks into the town, along with his riflemen.

OCCUPY ESCHDORF

When the leading tank suffered a direct hit from an 88, Capt. Swift, riding on the opposite flanks of the vehicle, was hurled from its side, but he managed to crawl back to the third platoon, which had occupied several buildings. Then as enemy tanks closed in, he ordered each window and door to be defended and he himself adopted an exposed position on an upper story, from where he accounted for at least 12 enemy riflemen and caused others to withdraw.

Company couldn't stay in the town that time. As darkness fell, Jerry began to drop mortars and Capt. Swift withdrew his men to a dug-in position just outside the town. Next morning, shortly after 1 o'clock, the task force launched a major attack on Eschdorf and, after fighting all through the daylight hours, occupied the town.

The Sure river lay invitingly before the men of the 26th Division. When they crossed it, and they would cross it, the enemy harassing the Fourth Armored on the left would have to fall back or be caught between two American forces.

Story of How Hub Man Joined YD Reads Like Fiction

By THORBURN WINANT

WITH THE TWENTY-SIXTH INFANTRY DIVISION, Luxembourg, Jan. 12 (AP)—Pvt. Samuel Swanson fought beside his father in the 26th Division in the First World War and was determined to fight with the outfit again.

Swanson, 43, whose mother lives in Charlestown, Mass., toured five countries and was a semi-permanent guest of seven reinforcement centers in his campaign to get with the division.

Months ago, when Swanson tried to enlist, he was rejected. The Army changed its mind later and sent him to Iceland with a non-combat outfit.

Swanson didn't like the deal and finally got transferred to the European theater of operations. But ETO officers would not classify him for combat.

For six months, he bounced from one reinforcement depot to another. Finally he ran into some GI's from the 26th Division, asked a few questions, studied maps, and took off—AWOL. The MP's picked him up in Paris for not having a pass.

Swanson told them he was from the 11st field artillery, 26th division. The police put Swanson on a truck headed for the 26th division area. He arrived during one of the worst shelling the division has ever undergone. In the confusion, he was mistaken for some one else and assigned to a wire repair team.

He was not detected for two weeks, and then a note arrived from the MPS in Paris telling of a German prisoner of war dressed in American uniform.

Swanson was taken to the division prison cage and questioned by intelligence officers. He finally got a clean bill of health by convincing them that he had lived for 40 years near the Bunker Hill monument in Boston and that his father was vice-president of the Spanish War Veterans and one of the founders of the American Legion.

Swanson now is a member in good standing of the 6th, the old Yankee Division.

WITH THE 26TH DIVISION, LUXEMBOURG, Jan. 17—There are occasional cosy moments in the war and last night provided some in the orderly room of headquarters company of the Yankee Division, comfortably behind the fighting line, out of range though not of sound of screaming-memories the Germans were throwing over in their attempt to demoralize as well as kill Yank fighters.

There was a merry wood fire in the funny little stove in the orderly room that in peacetime was the parlor of the home of one of the comparatively few Nazi-admiring Luxembourgers. It was too early to go to bed and too dark and sleety to go out, so we sat as close to the cheery fire as we could and talked the night away.

'NO ALTERNATIVE'

At first it seemed unfair that should be so comfortable, when boys fighting our war were out in the snow and sleet, perhaps, if we were lucky, trying to get sleep in a straw-filled hole dug into the side of the hill. But as we thawed, we began to look forward to the kind of world we hope we will see when the fighting is done and looked back to the fun we had before the Nazi pseudo-super plunged the world into war.

BRIEF MOMENT AS CIVILIAN BRINGS WEST ROXBURY SERGEANT GOLD BAR

101st Non Com in Officer Ranks For Daring in Combat Crisis

By CATHERINE COYNE
[Wireless to The Herald]

WITH 26TH DIVISION IN LUXEMBOURG, Jan. 18—For a few precious moments this afternoon, Edward D. Canty of West Roxbury was a civilian. They were exhilarating if hardly noticeable moments, a brief period between discharge from the Army as sergeant and acceptance of a battle commission as second lieutenant with the 101st Infantry Regiment.

The atmosphere in the partly destroyed farmhouse serving as regiment command post was charged with solemnity and pride, when the colonel commanding the regiment administered the oath making Canty an officer.

FITTED FOR ROLE

The 27-year-old former insulator for Johns-Manville Corporation had done an officer's work here, and now the division was recognizing him as an officer. For one thing, he had taken over when his company commander was injured. He knew the work and he knew the men in his outfit. He did a superior job, demonstrating a leadership that could not be matched by officers sent into the regiment as replacements.

W Roxbury Man Gets Gold Bar

When the ceremony was ended and everyone had congratulated Lt. Canty, the conversation focused on those brief moments of what everyone called "civilian freedom." The conversation was punctuated with wisecracking and laughter, yet underscoring it was the longing of these fighting men, members of a fast moving division, to return to civilian status.

BOSTON'S OWN

Lt. Canty has been with 101st "Boston's own" (Infantry Regiment) four years. He could have been an officer several years ago but turned down an opportunity to go to officers candidate school when he could not guarantee he would be returned to his beloved regiment.

He is a tall, good looking man whose honor today seemed to delight fellow soldiers as much as the officers who welcomed him into their midst. He is a good combat infantryman, who can wear the Bronze star, the Combat Infantryman's badge and the Purple Heart. He earned the last when, on a dangerous patrol mission, he was hit in the leg by a shell fragment. His duties now are as a battalion officer in operations section.

He is the son of J. Paul Canty, former political writer for Gaspar Bacon, and Mrs. Canty of West Roxbury. His younger brother, Pfc Henry Canty, also in the 101st, is listed as missing in action, the War Department notified his family although the new lieutenant is confident he is a prisoner of war.

The younger Canty was wounded on a patrol mission in France. Several attempts were made to rescue him, but none could get through the hail of Nazi fire that surrounded the place where he fell.

TREATED WELL

Lt. Canty interviewed every German medic captured by the division and from several received accurate description of his brother and assurance that though he had been wounded, he had received fine treatment.

"Today's ceremony would have been more thrilling if Henry had been here," the lieutenant said, "but I can't kick," he added. "I'm satisfied now that the kid's a prisoner, not dead, as I was afraid at first." The lieutenant is married to the former Louise Hanley who is waiting for him with year-old Virginia in Brighton.

Lt. Canty has five brothers and a sister in the armed forces. Serving overseas besides Henry is J. Paul, Jr., with the Engineers; George D., storekeeper 2-c, and Charles A., radar man, USNR, all in the Pacific. Robert S., S 1-c, is a gunner on duty in the Atlantic, and sister Pvt. Claire M. is with the Marines in North Carolina.

YANKEE HOTEL HEAVEN TO 26TH DIVISION BOYS

By CATHERINE COYNE

A FRENCH CITY, Jan. 21—"This how little it takes to please infantrymen fresh from combat. By motto of Yankee Hotel, newly American standards, Yankee Hotel opened rest center for the 26th Infantry Division on the outskirts of this French city. At home the boys would scorn such a place as this, but fresh from front-line foxholes, of snow-covered, shot-riddled Ardennes mountains.

It is terribly illuminating to see

To them it offered many wonders, chief of which was complete assurance that for three days they would not die. "Man," said a Yankee Division boy from Alabama, "you can't realize how good it is to know you can go to sleep at night without fearing the whistle of a Heinie 88 headed your way." It is as simple as that.

26TH MEETS RUSSIANS, BUT ONLY WORK GANG

By CATHERINE COYNE

Wireless to The Herald
WITH THE 26TH DIVISION, LUXEMBOURG, Jan. 25—Cloyd R. Brown of Livermore Falls, Me., assistant operations officer of Boston's Yankee Division regiment, is the most embarrassed man in the Army today. With that exuberant enthusiasm that characterizes every soldier's regard for a swiftpaced Russian offensive, he posted on the command post bulletin board a promise of 30-day American furlough to the first combat infantryman escorting Russians to headquarters.

Dozens of Russians were brought in when the artillery won Wiltz, a quaint town high in the Ardennes. For the most part, they were members of Work battalions. Few were able to demonstrate a loyalty toward Soviet Russia. Brown used that to wiggle out of the promise. Everyone teased him about going out on a limb that way but the most surprising aspect of the joke was that not an enlisted man with a hand in the capture of Russians attempted, even in fun to try to make Brown carry through on that promise.

Patton's Men Drive Huns To Border

Mop up Last of Ardennes Bulge

By BOYD LEWIS

PARIS, Jan. 27 (UP)—The American Third Army struck forward more than three miles on a 20-mile front today, spearing to the German border in the final mop-up of the Ardennes salient as Marshal von Rundstedt's forces fell back along a broad stretch between Holland and the Saar.

YD DRIVES AHEAD

Lt.-Gen. George S. Patton's forces reached the Our river, the boundary between Luxembourg and Germany, four miles northeast of by-passed Clervaux in a general close-in through the border area between points seven miles south of St. Vith and five miles north of Diekirch.

The 26th (Yankee) Division drove two miles eastward to the Skyline Drive overlooking the Luxembourg-Germany border.

Supreme headquarters reports and front dispatches said the Germans now were engaged in a large scale withdrawal before the combined blows of the American Third, First and Ninth armies and the British Second Army, which were wheeling into positions from which they could resume the Allied offensive.

WILTZ SHAKES OFF YULETIDE HORROR, BONDAGE IN NEW WELCOME TO YANKS

By CATHERINE COYNE
[Wireless to The Herald]

WILTZ, Luxembourg, Jan. 26—The terrible cost of freedom is proclaimed by wreckage of homes and the degradation of cellar living during five weeks of siege in this once beautiful, twice liberated mountain town, and the comparative cheapness of the awful price is demonstrated by the spirit of its people, especially its women.

Freed from German domination for the second time in five months, this time by a Boston infantry regiment of the Yankee division, Wiltz residents today forgot the horror of continuous artillery bombardment to give Americans a pathetically joyous welcome.

Sixty-five civilians, ranging in age from six months to 84 years, were living in the cellar of partially destroyed houses into which the regimental command moved temporarily. It was a deep, well constructed cellar but airless, lightless and heatless. The stench was unbearable to Americans but, philosophically, Luxembourgers pointed out the bad smell was better for them than the magnificently accurate Yankee artillery fire.

Prior to their September liberation, these people had been conquered four years by the Nazis. They had not been treated badly, considering the fate of the Poles and French. Germans regarded them as Germans and, in accordance with the strategy of their psychological warfare, treated them as Germans. Their warfare was purely political and once they had removed all Jews they set out to woo Luxembourg people to Germany's cause.

When the enemy returned five weeks ago everything was different. This time there was no wooing, merely threats, for, as one officer remarks, "the wind now blows from a different corner." Threats like lures were unavailing.

"It was stupid to try to make us Germans merely because we speak the German language," commented a 76 year old grandmother in a cellar today. "We will be what we are. They thought they were treating us well before, but what is good treatment if you are not free to be what you are?"

She was a little old lady who looked like a model for an artist's painting. She sat quietly on a stool, her back against the whitewashed stone wall of the cellar. Her white hair was brushed and knotted neatly and covered with a quaint bonnet of knitted black wool, tied with ribbons beneath her chin.

Over her shoulders was a knitted shawl of black wool and she protected her best black silk dress with an apron of snowy lawn. She sat as though in patient expectation, her hands folded in her lap. She had been sitting there, waiting, for five weeks.

One grandson is a German soldier.

dier; another son of her daughter refused to join the German army and spent two years in a concentration camp for the political crime of helping organize the Luxembourg Freedom Union, and now he is missing—perhaps helping Americans.

She refused to sit in judgment on her grandson in the army. "He was free to agree to go with Germans if he chose," she said. "I hate the Germans, but believe politics is a personal matter."

It was obvious her daughter, a pleasant faced plump woman in her early 50s, did not have her mother's detachment, but she didn't argue. She was too happy, now the Germans were gone, to argue, anyway.

"We could not stand them," she said. "They treated us well before if we did not disagree with them openly. But even then we hated them because they were trying to make us Germans. We who were not Jews lost little that you could see and touch, except a few whose sons were taken away. But they tried to change our spirit. They tried to make us Germans when we were determined to be what we are—Luxembourgers."

She was a leader of the cellar community, a strong minded cheerful woman, who took care of the sick, ordered children about and helped overworked doctors who fought vainly to maintain health against overwhelming odds.

Her house was a shambles, she admitted. It was a fine, modern house, lemon colored stucco, but now the roof was caved in, there was a gaping shellhole in the lemon yellow front, all glass was blown out and the chimney was down.

PRICE PAID

"It is sad," she conceded, "but it's as nothing compared with the way we feel. We knew when the Germans came back that this time we would have to pay a price for liberation. American soldiers paid a high price, their very lives. We have paid little when our cost was only fear, a little hunger and damaged houses. All our suffering can be wiped out, but soldiers cannot be brought back from death."

While we talked through an interpreter, children clamored for attention. A child too young to explain his trouble sobbed forlornly with cold. Another tot who wanted to go into the snowy street to watch the big parade of American vehicles screamed protestingly against his mother's firm ban. Pretty girls dashed in and out importantly, now bringing food, now excitedly describing latest condition of homes.

Families tried to maintain the family circle in cramped quarters. Some beds were garden benches stored in the cellar, but most slept on piles of straw covered by blankets. A few women had feather ticks to keep out cold.

Over everything was the smell of human beings crowded together without ventilation, without much washing, and smells of stale food, of illness and of rags burning in mounds of rancid grease to provide light.

A woman who seemed to be the spokesman ignored all that. She clasped her hands emotionally on her breast as she talked in rapid German. There was joy in her voice over liberation. Yet it was colored by sorrow for the loss of American youth. She told me eight civilians were killed here in Wiltz and that 25 were wounded. Doctors corroborated those figures. Of a population of 3600, about 2500 were in the city's cellars during the siege. Three babies were born during that time, one prematurely, and all lived. A six-month-old baby died of enteritis here in this cellar.

CHRISTMAS TRAGEDY

The worst day of the five-week period, she said, was Christmas. Everyone in Wiltz had been planning for that day, the first Christmas since liberation, and every family would entertain two soldiers at dinner. Children were counting days, even after they moved into cellars, for they were even surer than their elders that the German breakthrough was a temporary setback only.

"It was tragic. We could do nothing for the American boys that day," the woman said. "When the Germans came we saw some of the soldiers we had grown to regard as our friends killed or wounded or led away by the enemy. The Germans captured two truckloads of Christmas gifts and boasted about the good things they had taken from them—little cakes and candies they ate openly, warm clothes they stole, and then they threw other gifts around as though they were trash."

"On Christmas Day the children started to cry because it was unlike Christmas. That was the worst. We had only potatoes boiled in their jackets for dinner. American artillery was heaviest that day. We heard it hitting all around us and we knew it was knocking down our homes. We were afraid; we cannot deny that. It was fearful. Yet we were glad, too, because we knew Germans were in our homes; because we knew American guns were destroying German guns and German men."

"No, we didn't say c'est la guerre. We prayed to God. We prayed to God for freedom, for safety, for Americans."

ACCURATE ARTILLERY

With great glee a woman told me of the accuracy of American artillery. "It amazed the Germans," she said. "A sergeant set up a mortar position near my house and before he had a chance to use it the Americans began firing on it. He was very confused. He said that was the fifth position he had picked out, and not one was safe for him."

A doctor matched that story. The Germans set up a command post in the cellar of a substantial house. They sandbagged it heavily. They were sure they were reasonably protected from our artillery, but didn't count on freak accuracy. A shell came over, went through the door, down the stairs and exploded in the cellar, killing three Germans.

Wiltz was a beautiful if quaint town in autumn. Today it is shamefully wrecked, yet gallantly from blown out windows, from above shattered doorways, or across pocked buildings flew the tricolor of Luxembourg. A regiment of American infantrymen led by officers from Boston had presented this remote mountain town to Grand Duchess Charlotte as a birthday gift.

"The speed and brilliancy of your achievements is unsurpassed in military history."

"Recently I had the honor of receiving at the hands of Gen. Bradley (Lt. Gen. Omar N. Bradley, 12th Army Group commander) a second oak leaf cluster to the Distinguished Service Medal. This award was bestowed on me not for what I have done but because of what you have achieved."

"From the bottom of my heart, I thank you."

"My New Year wish and sure conviction for you is that, under the protection of Almighty God and the inspired leadership of our President and the high command, you will continue your victorious course to the end that tyranny and vice shall be eliminated, our dead comrades avenged and peace restored to a war-weary world."

"In closing I can find no fitter expression of my feelings than to apply to you the immortal words spoken by Gen. Scott at Chapultepec, when he said: 'Brave soldiers, veterans, you have been baptized in fire and have come out steel.'"

The message, dated Jan. 1, was contained in General Order No. 1, and was addressed to officers and men of the third Army and "to our comrades of the 19th tactical Air Command."

'Booby-trap' Ruse Welcome Interlude

By CATHERINE COYNE

[Wireless to The Herald]

WITH THE 26TH DIVISION, Luxembourg, Feb. 11—A regimental command post can be anything from a tent to a barn shared with odorous cows and pigs, but in Wiltz on the night and day following liberation of that mountain town an artillery-riddled mansion served briefly as fantastic headquarters for the famed liberating Boston regiment.

It is at the command post that the brains and paper work of the fighting is done. It is a place of maps and plans, of discussion and decision. At times it looks like something out of a Hollywood war movie and there are times when it looks like something out of this world. It was the latter at Wiltz.

When we checked in, after jeeping through the rutted, snowy streets of the desolation that once was a beautiful town, the drawing room of the mansion was serving as orderly room. The staff was in conference in the larger of two dining rooms.

The orderly room was a fine place, built for beauty and comfort that war could not erase, although its parquet floor was stained where rain and snow had frozen and thawed. The furniture was sumptuous but in excellent taste, including a rosewood piano that seemed to cry out for use. Curtains of fine rosy brocade hid the paper, rags and wood nailed over glassless window-frames.

Maj. Donald Healey of Westfield, seated in a high-backed chair of royal blue velour, presided at a magnificent carved table, with his field telephone, providing direct communication to division headquarters and to regimental battalions, at his right hand. Opposite him, in a chair of exquisite needlepoint which he thoughtfully covered protectively with an army blanket, Lt. Cloyd R. Brown of Livermore Falls, Me., marked an oilcloth map.

Officers and soldiers entered and left, bringing or taking reports and orders, while others, waiting on a big sofa of red velour, played with Luxembourg children who had wandered up from cellar shelters to make friends.

The scene was both domestic and martial. Brown, who has a really good baritone singing voice, challenged everyone who entered to play the piano. Vincent Sheean, author and correspondent, sat down and, as he softly played "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes," the chatter and business of war ceased. Brown left his maps to stand by the piano, first humming softly, then singing beautifully.

Officers bending over maps in the dining room conference stopped, too, crowding into the doorway to see as well as hear. The children sat quietly on soldiers' knees, their eyes wide with delight in this soothing song, so different after the consistent artillery barrages of the past five weeks.

There was no time for an encore. Brown returned to his map and Sheean went forward to visit a battalion in the next sizeable town up the mountain. But everyone seemed to feel better, more relaxed though no less determined, after that interlude.

That kind of interlude is important and so, too, are interludes of laughter, like the following, that ease the tension of battle-planning.

Everyone is booby-trap conscious, particularly when the regiment moves into a town on the heels of the enemy. Engineers go ahead, of course, to de-mine roads and to de-booby-trap command post areas. Shortly after the orderly room was opened, however, Maj. Healey heard a suspicious ticking that sounded like a mine about to explode.

He yelled excitedly for help in searching the room and it was cool, unfurried Lt. Col. Daniel J. Murphy of Natick, regimental executive officer, who discovered the "booby-trap": a metronome ticking away behind a stack of books. It had been set and planted as a gag by Capt. Elmer Fagerlund of Quincy.

The slim young captain likes to indulge his sense of humor and invariably gets away with it. He tried it less grimly on a friend and me when he prepared a room for us for the night. In the room were two carved mahogany beds minus springs and mattresses. Into the empty spaces of those beds he had set up two army cots, then ceremoniously ushered us into the room.

The master bedroom of the mansion, it was the coldest place I've ever been in. Windows were blown out, of course, though now they were covered by curtains of brocade. There were patches of snow and ice on the floor.

We had five army blankets each, but we crawled into them with all our clothes on. As she gulped with each Nazi artillery shell that landed in the city that night, my friend wondered why she was choking, and found she had neglected to loosen her necktie.

The tie and my boots were all I took off that night. I even wore a pair of borrowed pilot's pants, a tremendous garment of waterproof cloth lined with several inches of fleece, and I tied a heavy wool scarf about my head. Even then I wasn't warm.

In the morning, at a breakfast of shell-not powdered-eggs fried sunnyside up and hot cocoa, I told Col. Murphy at last I thought I knew something of the discomfort of living in foxholes.

"None of our boys were in foxholes last night," he said proudly. "We got them all under cover in buildings with stoves. Only the patrols were out in the cold and even they had opportunity to come indoors to sleep."

Then he added: "Anyway, a foxhole would have been more comfortable than this house. The boys keep warm in straw and blankets in holes dug into the snow and protected from the wind."

I won't say he wasn't telling the truth. I know the house, apart from the corner of the orderly room near the pot-bellied stove, was indescribably cold, but I cannot believe a foxhole has an iota of comfort.

Two YD Men Promoted on Battlefield

WITH THE TWENTY - SIXTH DIVISION IN GERMANY, MARCH 14—Two second lieutenants whose heroic actions won them battlefield promotions from the rank of sergeant have been awarded Bronze Stars by order of Maj. Gen. Willard S. Paul, commanding the Yankee Division.

They are Lt. Anthony E. Zardeskas, of 2 Mercer street, South Boston, and Lt. John P. Murphy, of 123 Norwood street, Newtonville.

Then a staff sergeant and chief of detail for an artillery battery, Lt. Zardeskas set up an observation post on a strategically located hill to watch for an expected counter attack and to direct tank artillery fire. He and his men stayed at the post all one night under mortar and machine gun fire, and all the next day. Still the expected counter attack did not develop.

The next night soon after dark, Lt. Zardeskas heard the movement of troops about 150 yards ahead. First ordering his men to take cover, he crawled forward alone to a spot from which he could have an excellent field of observation. Then he called for artillery and directed a devastating fire which halted the enemy movement, inflicted heavy casualties and foiled the counter attack.

After company L of the 101st regiment had suffered casualties while engaged in consolidating new positions, Lt. Murphy, then a technical sergeant and acting platoon leader, was forced to take command of the company. In the absence of all officers, he reorganized it under heavy fire and under his command the company beat back a succession of German counter-attacks during the night; then in the morning Lt. Murphy led an attack which took the enemy's positions and killed 50 Germans.

87th Clears Coblenz of Foe, Bradley Lauds 4th Armored

By GENE CURRIVAN

[Boston Herald-N. Y. Times Wireless]

WITH THE THIRD ARMY, March 17—The once proud, beautiful city of Coblenz at the confluence of the Rhine and Moselle rivers tonight was in American hands. The 87th Division is in there taking care of the last scattered resistance.

To the south of Coblenz, in a new rectangular trap bounded by the Moselle, Rhine, Saar and Nahe rivers, several thousand German troops are facing annihilation or rout. They have but one way to go and that is eastward.

Sudden thrusts by U. S. Armored columns, which already have cut two ribbons through the rectangle paralleling the Rhine, places the enemy in the position of having Americans in front of them and behind them. Our forces at the Saar are battling through one of the most formidable parts of the Siegfried line while other American units have cut far behind the line, blocking possible escape to the northeast.

This spectacular thrust across the trap was made by the Fourth Armored Division, which is the fastest moving outfit in this or any other army. Since noon Thursday when Maj.-Gen. Hugh Gaffey gave the order to drive on, the Fourth slashed two swaths each 33 miles long right across Germany from the Moselle to the Nahe river.

This was the second time in two weeks that the Fourth has made one of its famous breakthroughs. The other was made to Coblenz. Gen. Omar Bradley thought well enough of the present achievement to send a congratulatory message to Gen. Gaffey through his chief, Gen. Patton. He characterized the maneuver as a "bold adventure."

Over the entire Third Army front we captured 17 towns, cleared four and entered three. The 90th Division advanced three miles and is on the Rhine along a six-mile front from two to eight miles south of Boppard or 15 south of Coblenz. The division also captured Saint Goar, Bad Salzig and Pfaffenbeck.

The Fifth Red Diamond Division, operating 10 miles north and west of Simmern, captured 10 towns before slowing up for the night. But 10 miles west of Simmern, which is in the northeastern part of the rectangle, the 11th Armored, taking a page out of the Fourth's book, shot ahead seven miles to capture Wurlich. This thrust was through the Moselle bridgehead established by the 89th Division. The 11th also took Buckenbeuren, during its dash through the countryside.

On the Saar front the 26th moved on a five-mile front and captured Mettlach, eight miles south of Saarburg, while the 80th took Waden, 15 miles southeast of Saarburg. The 10th Armored Division gained a mile through brutal terrain while the 94th and the Third cavalry Division advanced east and northeast in the area east of Trier.

Quincy's Sgt. Zacchine, 54, To Retire from YD Armor

WITH THE FOURTH ARMORED DIVISION AT THE RHINE, March 13—First sergeants in the U. S. Army are fabulous creatures. True the tradition is 1st Sgt. William Zacchine, 54-year-old soldier from Quincy who is going back to the United States to be retired after 30 years of soldiering.

Sgt. Zacchine won the Bronze Star in the present war. His ETO ribbon has three bronze service stars representing participation in the Normandy, northern France and Germany operations and he also wears the Mexican border campaign ribbon, the Victory medal, the Good Conduct medal and the American Defense medal.

The sergeant was married for the second time two years ago and his wife, Mrs. Ruth Zacchine, lives in Los Angeles. His first wife died 15 years ago.

WITH THE YANKEE DIVISION—The old originals of the YD in World War I never fought through such wildernesses of this topsy turvy world as the current YD is fighting through today. Even the famous Argonne Forest seems a mere scuffle in the Arnold Arboretum, in comparison with the jumble of the Saar mountains, where God seems to have piled his left-over material when he made the world.

It is an upside down world of huge geographical wrinkles, steep drops and dizzy heights, with roads that are narrow goat-runs, and covered with thick pine forests, like the scruff of a buffalo's back. Nature lovers might pay fortunes to reach such scenic heights and stand bewitched by the wild disorder, but there is no beauty here for the American soldiers who live in constant danger of land mines or cunningly concealed pillboxes, from which frowzy Germans pot them like hunters from a duck blind. To them the country is hideous.

So we inch our way to a mountain crest, where a battalion commander looked down on the fathomless valleys of the Saar river, winding like silver ribbon. We jeered for miles along a narrow shelf that was grooved along a mountain rim, and where any sudden skid on the greasy going would have caused a non-stop flight to 1000 feet below.

The climb would have taxed a mountain mule, but a tough automobile bronco, called a jeep, did it, bucking its way over boulders, squeezing through underbrush, and churning out of black water bogs till we reached the top.

COMMANDER KILLED

There were men scattered in a small clearing. They wore coal scuttle helmets and shapeless clothes, with a week-old stubble on their chins. Some popped out of slit trenches, like woodchucks, and some peered from concrete shelters. It was a scene such as Rip Van Winkle might have met in the Catskills.

German shrapnel had killed the battalion commander that morning with a scythe-like splinter which pierced his heart.

"No bigger'n that," said Sgt. Raymond Thibault, Greenwood ave., West Newton, holding up a thumb and forefinger. "Great guy."

He spoke as one who lays a verbal wreath on the grave of a lamented friend, and then turns resolutely to an unfinished task.

For there are no tears here. The wavering line between life and death is too thin for morbid brooding. It was strange to think that at this instant the traffic is buzzing busily along Tremont st., with crowds of mid-day workers swarming into lunch bars for quick snacks, and folks peering into shop windows or loitering on the Common.

There is no kinship between that placid far-away world and this one, where artillery shells fizz overhead like the squirt of giant seltzer bottles, and noises echo through valleys, as of slamming heavy oaken doors.

"What do the people at home think of the war?" they have asked me over and over, as children might project their minds towards the sky on a clear night and question:

"Mummy, what sort of people

War is mass insanity. It was fantastic that men, because of geographical accident of birth, should be hunting each other in this mountain vastness, like wild beasts, and living, stinking and unkempt, in gopher holes—men prodded on by artificial hatred till it seizes the soul and dissolves the conscience—victims of Europe's age-old distempers—children of catastrophe.

YD Rolling Toward Rhine After 4 Days of Slugging

(Traveler Staff Correspondent)

WITH THE 26TH DIVISION IN GERMANY, March 19—Rolling toward the Rhine over this dust-laden countryside, New England's famed Yankee Division is setting a record comparable to that of the Fourth Armored in its recent stab at Germany's midriff.

Though not motorized, the division has raced 36 miles in a week.

And 28 of those miles were made in the last three days—an average of more than nine miles a day, an average of which any free-wheeling armored outfit would be proud.

Wehrmacht. Ludwigshafen was being cleared out, but 10 miles to the southwest there was a formidable German pocket.

"You can go forward 20 miles if you like," Capt. John Arnott of 28 Salem street, Reading, motor officer for the 101st Regiment of the Yankee Division, told me. "But if you go back five miles you'll get into trouble."

Correspondents are not the only befuddled citizens. Soldiers are just as much in the dark as to what areas have been cleared. Thus, the other day Lt.-Col. Dan Murphy of Natick, executive officer of the 101st, and Pvt. Bob Coe of 101 Playstead street, West Medford, almost liberated a town by themselves.

RAN INTO ROAD BLOCK

"We came down the road to this town, see," Coe told me, "and we ran into a road block. Well, we hung around awhile trying to figure a way to get by it and all of a sudden we saw one of our own companies just going in on another road. We were the first guys to get there."

Traveling by night is strictly a grade A risk. With Buck Griffin of the Worcester Gazette I left 26th Division headquarters a little after 6 o'clock the other night to go to the command post of the 104th regiment, only 10 miles east. We knew the name of the 104th's town and we had a map but we were on the road exactly four hours and finally wound up at the 101st because in the pitch darkness we got on several wrong roads and found ourselves suddenly mixed up in a Sixth Armored convoy far out of the YD's zone.

It was an eerie experience. The towns presumably cleared of troops were quiet in a way that seemed almost noisy, and we only saw four American soldiers while passing through five towns. All around us flares used by doughfeet to light up battle areas made the sky a sudden, frightening silver blob and guns boomed constantly.

That night we slept in a German house taken over by the military government section—slept in feather beds—while outside in the street the tired Yanks lined up their German prisoners in a formation which by daylight had grown to a small army of 300. The next day our maps were out of date again and we had to be briefed anew on what roads could be traveled.

3d Army Now Tops Others In Amount of Reich Soil Won

By GENE CURRIVAN

[Radio to Boston Herald-N. Y. Times]

WITH THE THIRD ARMY, March 19—Gen. Patton's forces virtually control about a third of what is left of the upper Rhine-land quadrangle. They now hold more German soil than any other army on the western front, and are nearest to Berlin.

Two magnificent armored thrusts from north and south made contact today 18 miles northwest of Kaiserslautern and closed in around an estimated 2000 who now have no place to go. The trap is 20 miles by 15 in the area between the Moselle and the Nahe rivers with its southern boundary about 10 miles east of Trier.

It was expected that many more would be caught in this particular pocket but the Germans saw it closing and got a considerable number of their forces out. Many of those, however, who managed to escape from the area, were wiped out by planes of the 19th Tactical Air Command as they jammed the roads leading eastward.

3d Army Has Lead in Reich

It was estimated that more than 1000 motor transports were bombed and strafed on these roads today, although official preliminary figures were 427 destroyed, 205 damaged. Much of this was done in the Kirn and Kaiserslautern areas where outgoing traffic was heaviest.

Patton has four complete armored divisions and 10 armored battalions slashing their way through this Rhineland quadrangle now in addition to his formidable infantry divisions. Again today they fanned out so swiftly that opposition was negligible except in front of the fourth, which is running into fanatical resistance up in a Rhine corner only 12 miles southwest of Mainz.

This city of 158,000, one of the principal Rhine cities, is now one of the leading escape routes for the Germans in the upper quadrangle. It is but 15 miles from Bingen which the 90th Division captured last night.

The capture of Bingen gives the Third Army control of the Rhine to north of Coblenz. The distance from Coblenz to Berlin is 275 miles, or less than the distance which separates any other western front army from the Reich capital. It was only a week ago that the Third Army looked like an "also ran" in the race for Berlin but now we are a neck in front of the First Army which had been leading the way.

Down in the Saar basin our infantry divisions pushed out against stiff resistance in and around the Siegfried line. The 26th moved forward on a five-mile front and cleared Dermingen, 17 miles east of Merzig. In doing so, elements of the division captured a complete field artillery battalion with its commander, men and equipment. The 80th cleared Wendel, 20 miles northeast of Saarlautern, and are well behind the Siegfried line. The Germans west and south of Wendel will have to get out fast or be trapped by Gen. Patch's Seventh Army which is moving northward.

PARIS, Tuesday, March 27 (AP)—The American Seventh Army hurdled the Rhine early yesterday, joining six other Allied armies in the drive on Berlin. The Germans reeled back from a series of breakthroughs, in one of which the U. S. First Army drove 35 miles.

ENTER FRANKFURT

Behind Patton's armor, infantry cleared Hassloch, seven miles east of Mainz, overrun several towns between the fallen city of Darmstadt and Frankfurt, and pushed on into Frankfurt's outskirts.

The 26th Infantry Division was disclosed to be operating in the Third Army's original Rhine bridgehead along with the Fifth and 90th Infantry, the Fourth Armored Infantry and Fourth Armored Divisions.

The Third Army took 5214 prisoners Sunday.

The Germans threw the 116th Panzer Division into the path of Gen. Simpson's Ninth Army as it drove through the forests of the Ruhr.

A tank battle raged five miles southeast of Dorsten, which is 17 miles from the Rhine due east of Wesel.

The 30th Infantry Division was battling nine miles north of Essen after a four-mile advance up to late afternoon. Other Ninth Army forces crossed the Lippe river to protect the 30th's north flank, since the British Second had been unable to keep pace.

Forces fighting along the Lippe were 12 miles east of the Rhine and were locked in another tank battle south of Gahlen.

The 79th Division to the south likewise ran into tank opposition and found the going slower, but it was fighting in Wehoven, northeast suburb of Duisburg, the Ruhr port with a population of 31,000.

The 79th captured Hefeld and pressed two and a half miles east where it was nine miles northwest of Essen.

The super highway to Berlin had been cut in at least three places as the British, Americans and Canadians struck out through northern Germany from a solid bridgehead, now more than 31 miles long.

Fighting Scots gave the British Second Army a bridgehead 15 miles deep at an undisclosed point.

A bulletin from the First Army front said powerful tank forces of Gen. Hodges had penetrated to the highway town of Heckholzhausen in a 35-mile thrust out of the Remagen-Erpel bridgehead, while other armored units smashed into the junction city of Limburg in a 22-mile thrust.

Heckholzhausen is eight miles northeast of Limburg.

(German advices to Madrid said the big push was the greatest in size and intensity ever mounted by the Allies in Europe and declared the British and American armies were using new arms and tactics.)

Seventh Army in Surprise Leap

Seventh Army veterans struck without artillery or air preparation in a surprise assault at an undisclosed point. Earlier the Germans had said the Americans were hammering at the gates of the big traffic center of Karlsruhe, on the south part of the front.

Power-laden U. S. First Army tank teams raced unchecked into the city of Limburg. Other armored forces smashed 15 miles eastward, trying to crush the Germans before they could escape a pincers being formed by the First and U. S. Ninth armies.

The U. S. Third Army's original breakthrough forces of the Fourth Armored Division were ripping into the middle of Germany under a security blackout, probably well beyond positions reported yesterday, when they were 40 miles east of the Rhine.

Maj Gen Paul of Y-D Awarded DSM for Capable Leadership

WASHINGTON, March 31 (AP)—The award of the Distinguished Service Medal to Maj Gen Willard S. Paul of Shrewsbury, Mass., commander of the 26th (Yankee) Division, was announced today by the War Department.

His "calm, capable leadership" from Oct. 8, 1944, when the YD went into the front lines as part of the XII Corps, until Dec. 12 when the division smashed through the Maginot Line, was cited in the official order giving him the decoration.

"From Nov. 8 to December," the citation said in part, "he led the division in a sustained advance of approximately 50 miles over terrain which afforded many natural obstacles, including the Seille and Saar rivers, against stubborn enemy resistance."

"Through skillful employment of the elements of his command he developed the maximum power required to achieve break-throughs of successive strong enemy defense lines, and forced the enemy elements opposing him, including battle-wise Panzer units and fanatical SS troops, into a series of withdrawals."

Die-Hard Nazi Garrison Quits, Hangs Own 'Traitor' Officer

ASCHAFFENBURG, Germany, April 3 (AP)—The die-hard Nazi garrison in this German barracks city on the banks of the river Main surrendered today to the 45th Infantry division of the U. S. Seventh Army after a fierce week-long battle in which both German civilians and soldiers fought the Americans.

Shortly after 9 A. M., the ruthless German Major von Lambert, who had hanged two of his officers in the streets of Aschaffenburg during the peak of the fighting, led his troops in a white-flag parade from the old four-towered castle in the heart of the city.

And here, in the flaming, smoking rubble heaps of a city that once had sheltered 40,000 Germans, the GI's found an answer to the oft-repeated question, "Why do these guys keep on fighting?"

It was found in the heart of the business district—at No. 5 Herstattstrasse, to be exact.

There in front of a winery hung the body of a young German lieutenant. His hands were tied, but he was not blindfolded. He swung from a rope twisted tightly around his neck, with the other end of the rope tied to a steel support for a sign.

Civilians said he was hanged on the orders of von Lambert, who had dictated this text of a garishly painted placard tacked to the front of the winery:

"Cowards and traitors hang!"

"Yesterday—an officer candidate from Alsace-Lorraine died a hero's death in destroying an enemy tank. He lives on."

"Today—here hangs a coward in officer's garb because he betrayed the fuhrer and the people. He is dead forever."

YD Spearheads Smash Way into Fulda

By JAMES M. LONG

PARIS, April 2 (AP) — The American Third Army, spearheaded by the 11th Armored and 26th Infantry Divisions, drove today into Fulda and Kassel, 165 miles from Berlin, and within 198 miles of the Russian lines while other Allied armies grimly mopped up 40,000 to 100,000 of Germany's best troops, trapped in the encircled Ruhr.

Gen. Omar N. Bradley sent tank columns far beyond both Kassel and Fulda, one armored column reaching within 155 miles of Berlin at a point three miles northwest of Eisenach at the northwest edge of the famous Thun-garian forest.

There, Lt.-Gen. George S. Patton's army was 95 miles from Leipzig and closest to the Russian front in its swift power drive to bisect the Reich and bar access of troops in the north from the Bavarian Alps, where Hitler may be preparing for his last stand.

Supreme headquarters said all of Field Marshal Walther von Model's army group B, strongest left on the western front and containing the last tank army opposing

It was the 26th (Yankee) division which entered the outskirts of Fulda in the path blazed by the 11th armored division.

The 6th armored division was encountering strong resistance, including tanks and numerous assault

KNOWN TO CATHOLICS

Fulda is known to Catholics all over the world. The tomb of St. Boniface, apostle of the Germans and the man who brought Christianity to the Reich, is there. German cardinals, archbishops and bishops ordinarily meet in Fulda each year and issue pastoral letters which are read from Catholic pulpits. When Hitler came into power, the pastoral letters were delivered by couriers a few minutes before church services began in order to prevent the Gestapo from seizing the pronouncements.

A few isolated German pockets were being erased in the vast expanse overrun last week by the Third Army. Some 300 SS troops were reported holding out in Rotenberg, 24 miles southeast of Kassel. A few traps still were being mopped up north of Frankfurt on the Main.

The Germans mined the Frankfurt-Berlin superhighway in spots and ambushed supply lines behind Patton's vanguards in small scale actions.

In Europe, spearheads of the 26th division (YD) drove into the outskirts of Fulda, and other units of the Third Army entered Kassel both 165 miles from Berlin and within 195 of the Russians. Gen. Patton's tanks were within three miles of Eisenach and 96 of Leipzig. The Seventh Army's 12th armored division reached the suburbs of Marienburg, across the Main from the Bavarian city of Wuerzburg. Lt.-Gen. Patch's units had linked with the French, who have driven 18 miles beyond the Rhine.

Berlin said the British had advanced more than 35 miles beyond Muenster, capital of Westphalia. The Germans, fearing a trap by Field Marshal Montgomery, were reported pulling out of Holland, thus possibly freeing Britain from the menace of V-weapons, one of which has fallen in England since Thursday.

Today it was announced that "we've got the personnel back, but the vehicles are gone." No further amplification was given as to whether the hospital personnel, numbering about 100, including seven nurses, was recaptured or released by the Nazis. It was said, however, that apparently all the Nazis wanted were the vehicles "to get back to their lines."

Nazi Slaves Died In Abortion Camp

WITH THIRD ARMY TROOPS IN GERMANY, April 13—This cluster of unpainted wooden barracks buildings in the Pfaffen-vald section of Germany's beautiful pine grown Stadts Forst, Niederaula was Adolf Hitler's abortion camp.

Into this little clearing encircled by 15 foot-high barbed wire fences pregnant Russian and Polish women were herded so that the Nazi state might destroy the life within them.

In the last year a high domed chronic alcoholic renegade Russian doctor performed 200 abortions and 90 prematurely induced births on his home-made red oilcloth covered "delivery" table and the embryo human beings produced were dumped into a common grave.

FEAR NAZI AMBUSH

Another column entered Klettenberg, 57 miles southwest of Magdeburg and 121 miles southwest of Berlin, and a third reached Kollida, nine miles southeast of Bilzingsleben and 49 miles west of Leipzig.

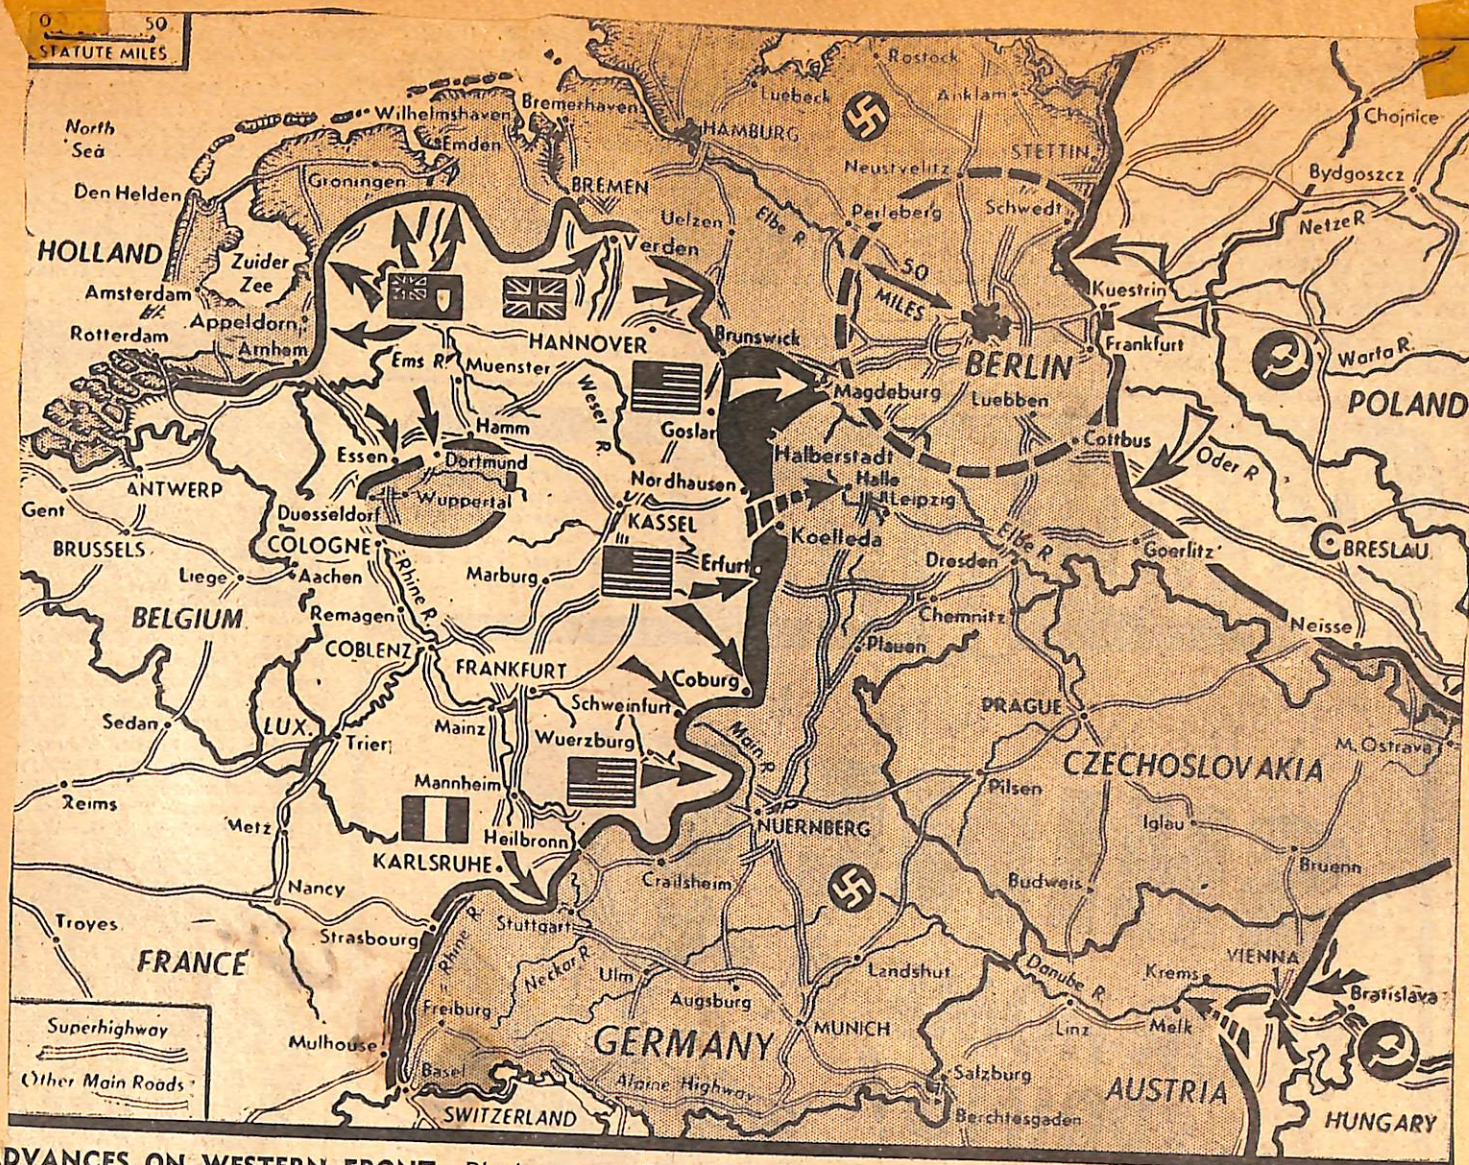

The Third Armored Division's push around the southern flank of the Hartz mountains was proceeding cautiously because of the possibility that large forces of Germans might be waiting in the towering heights to ambush them.

A front dispatch said opposition from small arms and scattered German tanks was increasing on the third armored division's sector.

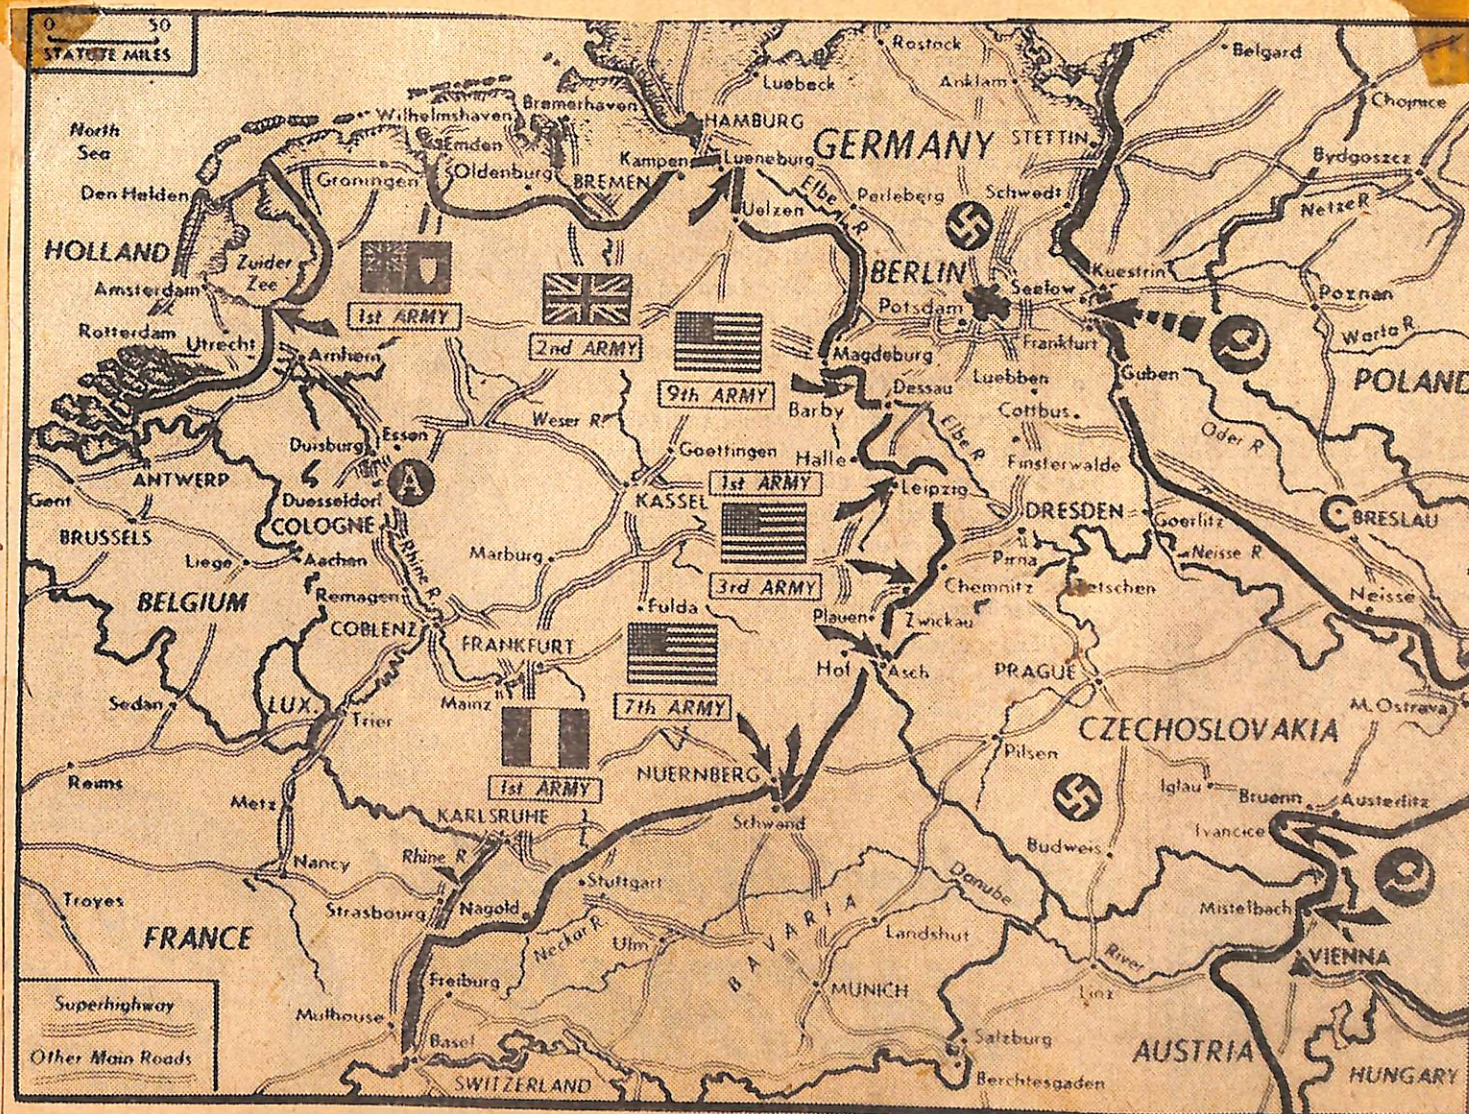

The 11th Armored Division captured Neustadt, eight miles northwest of Coburg and 42 miles west of the Czechoslovak border, in a five-mile advance.

The Fourth Armored Division advanced 25 miles and another tank column, 46 miles, in the past 24 hours under the security blackout, United Press War Correspondent Robert Richards reported from the Third Army front.

Participating in the new offensive were the Fourth, Sixth and 11th Armored and the 80th, 76th, 89th, 90th, 87th and 26th Infantry divisions along a 60-mile front.

WESTERN FRONT:

By DREW MIDDLETON
[Boston Herald-N. Y. Times Wireless]

PARIS, April 20—The Allied offensive toward Hitler's national redoubt in southeastern Bavaria developed with dramatic suddenness today. Tank and infantry columns of the First French and Seventh and Third U. S. Armies plunged southward and southeastward for gains of 10 to 20 miles on a front of close to 200 miles with the French on the right smashing through the Black Forest to within 25 miles of the Swiss frontier and American tank columns on the left driving to within 50 miles of Augsburg and Regensburg and 70 miles from Munich.

Nuremberg which Hitler once called "the most German of all cities" fell this afternoon. On Hitler's 56th birthday long columns of American tanks rolled southward onto the Bavarian foreland following the routes of Napoleon's armies in the march to Ulm.

While the assault on the national redoubt increased in tempo, British and Canadian forces, hammering at enemy defenses in Holland and the northern redoubt along the German North sea coast made further progress.

PATTON MOVES AGAIN

The 11th Armored division of Gen. Patton's army, after a lull of six days, resumed operations, striking 16 miles to the southeast to storm Graffenwoh, 20 miles southeast of Bayreuth. Another column reached Kermanth, 14 miles southeast of Bayreuth. Graffenwoh was held by 500 German troops for an hour and 45 minutes before it was finally cleared.

Meanwhile, the 90th Infantry Division, advancing toward the Eger gap, the main route into northwestern Czechoslovakia, cleared the towns of Selbe and Theirstein after a six-mile gain and closed to positions 2½ to four miles west of the frontier. Other columns of this division pushed into Ober Redwitz, 21 miles northeast of Bayreuth and Angerlein, two miles southeast of Hof. Elements of this division are already over the Czech frontier.

The 26th Infantry Division is following the 11th Armored Division southeast. Hastening in the tracks of the tanks, the doughboys advanced from six to 14 miles to the southeast. One column reached Ramelsruth, 11 miles southeast of Bayreuth and another captured an air field nine miles southeast of the town.

As the advance continues to the southeastward along the Bohemer Wald's western edge, Allied bombers are hammering German oil depots, ammunition dumps and railroad yards in the Bavarian forest and west of Munich in front of the advances both to weaken enemy

LONDON, April 16 (AP)—Adolf Hitler in an order of the day to German soldiers on the eastern front declared tonight: "For the last time the Jewish-Bolshevist arch enemy has launched his massed attack. He is trying to destroy Germany and to wipe out our people."

WITH AMERICAN FIRST ARMY IN GERMANY, April 16 (UP)—The American First, Third and Ninth Armies have taken more than 218,000 German prisoners in the past 72 hours in a mass round-up that at many points has lost all resemblance to war.

PARIS, April 16 (AP)—Third Army infantry advanced to within eight miles of Czechoslovakia today and virtually bisected Germany, whose western front already has been split into northern and southern commands.

The Germans rushed troops and tanks from the eastern front and Berlin to oppose the grave threat to their ruined capital, 45 miles from the Ninth Army elements north of Magdeburg. Three Nazi divisions stamped out the original Elbe river bridgehead at Magdeburg, but another east bank salient at Barby was deepened four miles to within 53 miles of Berlin on the open Brandenburg plain.

Some 3000 Germans were surrendered by their commander in the eastern segment of the severed Ruhr pocket.

Duesseldorf Also Entered as Yanks Mop Up Pockets

PARIS, Wednesday, April 18 (AP) — American armies, which already have virtually bisected Germany, broke into the prize cities of Leipzig and Magdeburg yesterday as British tanks tore loose on a 22-mile sweep that carried within 25 miles of the great port of Hamburg.

Duesseldorf, last major city in the Ruhr still held by the Germans, also was entered by doughboys who now have whittled down the Ruhr pocket to 125 square miles from its original 3000 square miles.

The U. S. Third Army stabbed to a point four miles from the Czechoslovak border, with one or more of its armored columns operating under a news blackout and without thought to be about 75 miles from Russian positions on the eastern front.

For the most part the American armies concentrated their might on clearing out fierce pockets of Nazi resistance.

NEAR CZECH LINE

A late front dispatch said that Gen. Patton's 90th Infantry division, which with the 26th Infantry is driving toward Czechoslovakia on a 15-mile front, had pushed eastward two miles during the day to within four miles of completing its stab across the waist of Germany.

The German garrison of Chemnitz, beleaguered fortress city 38 miles west of Dresden, rejected a Third Army ultimatum to surrender and was being stormed from less than two miles away.

Gen. Hodges' First Army troops crashed through Leipzig's outer defenses on the fourth day of the battle for that city and were meeting lessening resistance as they fought into its bomb-shattered outskirts. Some captured Nazi garrison members proved to be military mental cases, and some uniformed women were killed as they manned defense guns.

Two crack divisions of Gen. Simpson's Ninth Army—the 30th Infantry and the Second Armored—launched an all-out assault on Magdeburg after heavy aerial preparation and were reported making "excellent progress" through the streets of the industrial city on the banks of the Elbe river.

EX-SLAVES CHEER

It was the first real attempt to take Magdeburg since it was reached a week ago, though Ninth Army troops had crossed the Elbe both above and below the city.

Hoffman certainly did when he was living in Germany in 1937. This Kraut once had helped some Hitler youth brats to beat him up. "Get back in line," Hoffman told the PW sternly. Then with only a passing glance of contempt the American soldier moved on.

Tully Gets Spring Fever In Sun at Czech Border

Traveler Staff Correspondent

BATTALION COMMAND POST BEFORE THE CZECH BORDER, April 17 (Delayed)—It was very pleasant to be alive today. The sun had come out bright and warm and it was the kind of balmy day when youngsters back in the States would be thinking about taking their first swim of the season.

This command post of the Third Battalion of the Yankee Division's 104th regiment was smack on the outpost line with nothing between it and the Czech border in miles to the east but elements of a Nazi division. If you went out into the yard of the farmhouse which was battalion headquarters you were in fact in No Man's Land and German observation posts on a wooded ridge about two miles to the east easily could spot you with field glasses.

In this fantastic war this particular No Man's Land was a very funny No Man's Land. It consisted in the immediate foreground of a small pond upon which ducks were scurrying about and down the dirt road which was just outside the imaginary outpost line and which ran north and south past the farmhouse a grimy GI was riding a plowhorse bareback. The only noises of war were the occasional bangs of our 105 howitzers behind us. It seemed strange that the enemy wasn't trying to hit this CP but when you mentioned it to Lt. Col. Howard Dellert of Pittsfield, the battalion CO, he grinned. "Aw, they let us alone as long as we're not attacking," he said. They haven't got enough artillery to be shooting it all the time and we're just out of small arms range."

CPL. CARLTON SHEEHAN

A PLEASANT LULL

Everybody was taking advantage of the lull in the business of war. Dellert had just finished a leisurely shave and he and some other officers were having mid-morning coffee in the farmhouse living room. Outside some other officers and some GIs had their cameras out and were taking snapshots against the rather unattractive background of a beaten up barn.

"How about staying to dinner," asked Cpl. Carlton Sheehan of 100 Queenbury street, Back Bay, a headquarters clerk. He pointed to a basket loaded down with eight dressed chickens. "We're having a real banquet this noon."

Capt. Richard Risley of Springfield, the battalion executive officer, grinned. "Too bad," he said shaking his head, "those chickens were killed accidentally—c'est la guerre."

You went out to walk around in the nice sunshine with lean dark Col. Dellert, who took off his helmet from time to time to "let the air get at my flowing locks." He's got one of the shortest hair clips I've ever seen. The Colonel was not too impressed with the last town his men had taken. "Road blocks are what get me down," he said. "Sometimes it takes longer to take a road block than a town."

Then the colonel told you about how Lt. Dick Gannon of Westboro took a platoon of I company out the day before, ran into a road block and took 44 prisoners. "That's where we do most of our fighting these day," he said.

You wandered around and finally got to another farm building where 2nd Lt. George Farnsworth of Westfield was ranging around. Lt.

Farnsworth, promoted from staff sergeant last month is an 81 millimeter mortar section leader and it was his mortars that helped soften up the manufacturing town of Munchberg so that doughboys could go in and clear it.

In the house a Joe had his head down in a basin of water and when he came up for air he turned out to be Cpl. Ernest Ford of Chase street, Lynn, a forward observer with the 102nd Field Artillery. "I feel pretty," Ford told you with a practiced leer. He looked pretty, too with his face all smooth and shining from a fresh shave. Then it was time to go—time to get back to your communications and write a story when you felt more like dozing in the sun. When you got to your jeep there was Roxbury's Johnny Wilson snoozing serenely at the wheel and he woke up with much stretching and yawning.

"I got spring fever," Johnny said sheepishly. I guess I've got it, too. They ought to call off this war now the sun is back in the sky.

Tully

And here's thanks to Joseph C. Spang, Jr., president of the Gillette Razor Blade Co., for sending me a new razor, 100 wonderful blades and three huge tubes of shaving cream when I cabled my office asking for a razor. Spang came to the rescue by providing one out of what must have been his private stock.

Cpl. August Prossinger of Hollywood, Calif., chauffeur and orderly for Maj. Gen. Willard S. Paul, commander of the 26th Division, used to be butler for Maria Jeritza, Metropolitan Opera star. "I like generals better," Pross says, "they're not as temperamental."

The cognac that Remy Martin of France distilled and bottled for the Browne Vintners Co. of 50 Rockefeller Plaza, New York, finally landed in American laps. Hundreds of bottles of the stuff looted by the Nazis from France has been recaptured by the 26th Division in its great drive through the Thuringen Forest in Bavaria.

The average German country newspaper under Hitler was just about what you imagined. I had a little chat with the editor of the Zeitung in the arms manufacturing town of Suhl the other day and he disclosed that three of the four pages he printed came in the form of "boiler plate," or ready set plates from a central Nazi press headquarters. The fourth page was given over to local news and death notices, "especially death notices."

First sergeants, tough guys with hearts of stone? question mark sure like First Sgt. Dave Jennings of Newton for instance. When screaming meemies started falling around the command post of Company L, First Regiment, Sgt. Jennings ordered all the doughboys into the cellar—except Pfc. Nick Decarlo of Uniontown, Pa. Nick was asleep and Jennings had a hell of a time trying to wake him up. Finally when a shell scream gave deafening notice it was heading for the house Jennings threw himself on top of the sleeping Decarlo, sheltering the doughboy's body just as the shell hit the building and knocked in a wall. Neither was hurt.

Tonsorially speaking my cup is overflowing. A few weeks ago I finally prevailed upon a Luxembourg barber to cut my hair short—real short—practically a crew clip, and today I met the guy who's going to keep it that way. He is Pfc. Antonio A. J. Povoas of 90 Center street, North Easton, medical aid man with the 104th Regiment of the YD, who used to operate a barber shop on South avenue in Whitman. Povoas tells me his wife, Mary, read my story about how difficult it was to get a continental barber to cut any hair off when he gives you a hair cut, and wrote him to "meet that guy Tully and give him a decent hair cut." I'm in from now on, I guess.

Add manly chests with new Bronze Star medals: Sgt. Joe Mozzone of 233 Broad street, Bridgewater, son of Mr. and Mrs. Gildo Mozzone of 69 Hart street, Taunton. Sgt. Mozzone is bodyguard and radio operator for Col. Ralph Paladino of Somerville, commander of the 104th Regiment of the Yankee Division.

Only the 11th Armored Division of Gen. Patton's forces was reported in motion today. This unit on the right flank of the Third Army moved to good advantage, however, striking eastward it made seven miles to Rodach, nine miles northwest of Coburg with one column while another force pushed 15 miles to the northeast to reach points three miles northeast of Coburg, 40 miles from the Czechoslovak frontier.

Infantrymen made the remainder of the Third Army's advances. Doughboys of the 26th Division gained two miles on a four-mile front, 10 miles south-southeast of Suhl, while other doughboys closed in on Erfurt.

Allies Now Peril Mountain Retreat

By DREW MIDDLETON

[Boston Herald-N. Y. Times Wireless]

PARIS, April 10—The final offensive in the west has begun. Paced by tanks of the U. S. First Army elements of five armies, four of them American and one British, have broken out of the center of the Allied Expeditionary Forces line in Germany on a front of 185 miles from Cella in the north to Schweinfurt in the south, driving steadily into the heart of Festung Germania for gains of up to 25 miles which put the Allied tanks 120 to 130 miles from Berlin on the north and 40 miles from the Czechoslovak frontier on the south.

Entire German Center Ripped Open

The whole center of the German position, such as it is, has been broken open by new assaults by the First and Third armies of Gen. Bradley's 12th Army Group and not the enemy's capital but his cherished plan of withdrawing into the mountains of the southwest is imperiled by the latest advances.

Eisenhower's headquarters told the German people flatly tonight that "German resistance in the west has collapsed." He called on workers in North sea ports to block Nazi fanatics from wrecking harbor installations, and he urged them to prevent Nazis from seizing the last food and fuel stocks in the cities, declaring "you will need food and fuel to get over the initial period after the collapse."

But one of the most sparkling chapters in the story of the invasion of Germany is being written by the weary, unglamorous doughboys of the infantry.

These are the "dirty work boys" — the soldiers with rifles, machine guns, mortars and bazookas who really occupy enemy territory. The armor goes through on main roads and super highways; the infantry takes the back roads and the mountain passes and the miles of gloomy forests and cleans up the territory.

FOE MASSED NEAR BORDER, BREMEN FALLS

Seventh, French Share 3-Army Munich Drive Along 180-Mile Front

PARIS, Friday, April 27 (AP)—Heavily-gunned U. S. Third Army tank columns battled eight miles from Austria yesterday in a bid for a swift show-down with last-stand enemy troops massing at the border, and in the north the British captured Germany's second greatest port of Bremen.

As these blows fell on the north and south segments of dismembered Germany, Allied capitals of Europe buzzed with rumors started by a Swiss radio report that the Americans and Russians had met in the Elbe river area on "a front of many miles."

NEWS BLACKED OUT

Censorship covered American positions at the reported junction area, but a front dispatch from the U. S. First Army told of a patrol moving at will through German lines between the Mulde and Elbe rivers.

Bremen fell after a whirlwind assault of two days, and only snipers remained in the rubble to challenge the victorious British moving through the dock area of what once was a city of 250,000 people.

Ellenburg, on the Mulde river nine miles northeast of Leipzig.

Ulm, second city of Wurttemberg and important communications center on the Danube, fell to the combined assault of the American Seventh and French First armies.

The U. S. Third Army, continuing its spectacular drive southward from the boundary of Czechoslovakia, battled within four miles of the big traffic hub of Regensburg and within 35 miles of the Austrian border. Traveling fast under a partial news blackout, Gen. Patton's famed armored forces were closing in relentlessly on Regensburg from three sides and slicing hourly nearer the ramparts of the enemy's southern "fortress."

Patton's 26th Infantry, taking advantage of the enemy's disorganized state, seized several bridges intact across the Regan river, which flows northwest from Regensburg and sped across into the towns of Wachterling and Nittenau, 14 miles northeast of Regensburg. Other doughboy columns drove into Rechberg, 12 miles northwest of the city, and to the vicinity of Etzenburg, eight miles to the west.

The 11th Armored Division raced eastward for a 23-mile gain and reached the vicinity of Arnesriedt, 40 miles east of Regensburg and 11 miles north of the Danube. It was there that Patton's fighters were within 35 miles of Austria and about 93 miles due north of Hitler's Berchtesgaden hideout.

JUNCTION SUSPECTED

Allied headquarters, like the rest of the world, was awaiting an official announcement that American and Russian troops, last reported barely 20 miles apart between Dresden and Leipzig, had joined forces and split the Reich in two. Some correspondents here believed a preliminary junction already had been made.

The French press agency, quoting "reports from Moscow," said American and Soviet troops had met at

27,000 Set Free By Patton--British Sweep Over Elbe

PARIS, Monday, April 30 (AP)—Tanks and infantry of the U. S. Seventh Army took over Munich tonight, meeting practically no opposition as they rolled into the birthplace of Nazism.

U. S. Third Army tanks, dashing northeast of Munich, liberated 27,000 Allied prisoners of war, mostly American airmen, at Moosburg. It was one of the largest if not the largest group yet liberated on the western front.

The final battles in Europe raged on unabated as Gen. Eisenhower announced he knew nothing of an unconditional surrender offer from Germany or of any peace negotiations.

The British Second Army crossed the Elbe and captured Lauenberg, 20 miles east of Hamburg. The U. S. Ninth Army lashed out from its own bridgehead in another blow at what remains of Nazi Germany in the north.

The Canadian First Army in a surprise crossing of the Ems river drove north to within seven miles of the German North sea port of Emden.

No Signs of Resistance in Munich

Farther east, the 26th Division mopped up along the banks of the Danube northwest of Passau, 60 miles north of Salzburg, eastern stronghold of the Alpine fortress at the gateway to Hitler's Berchtesgaden, 10 miles farther south.

In Czechoslovakia, the 97th Division captured a stoutly-defended airfield a mile northeast of Eger, taking 350 prisoners.

A blackout still masked the movements of the 11th Armored Division in Austria farther south.

Officers inside the third largest city of the Reich flashed back word to headquarters that they found no evidence that the Germans intended to defend Munich—touted as the northern bastion of the Nazi retreat. Other officers at advanced headquarters said Munich might already have fallen.

The 42nd Infantry Division raced into the city first from the north, using a broad military highway. Then the 12th Armored Division hit Munich from the southwest, and the new 20th Armored Division—disclosed for the first time to be in action roared in from the west. These outfits had traveled at least 20 miles to reach this city where in 1938 the statesmen of France and Britain came to Hitler and made a pact for "peace in our time."

In the north the Russians have taken nearly all of Berlin.

He drove into the American lines in a natty car filled with 25 handbags and plenty of gasoline. He said he might have escaped, but decided to surrender now so that he might be spared the embarrassment of being captured later in the presence of retreating German soldiers.

Von Kleist said all he knew about Hitler was "only what I read in the papers." He was helped to adjust his colorful capes by his aide, Capt. Von Seydlitz, cousin of Gen. Walter von Seydlitz.

Sweeping eastward on a front of 150 miles, tanks and doughboys of Gen. Patton's Third Army plunged deeper into Czechoslovakia and Austria today, capturing Pilsen, last great armament center left to the enemy, and Carlsbad in the north and spurting to positions 16 miles southeast of Linz in the south.

Battered remnants of the German Seventh Army offered only moderate resistance to American columns today, while on all other sectors of the front Allied forces counted prisoners and tried to bring some order out of the great gray mass of beaten Germans now estimated at close to a million and a half soldiers and half a million civilians, which has eluded Allied lines in the last five days.

END DUE ANY HOUR

Although there is no news of a final surrender here tonight, this correspondent feels certain that capitulation of Doenitz or one of his representatives is imminent. There is no question about the fact of defeat, the only problems are what form it will take and who will represent the Soviet armies at the final scene in the long grim drama which has wrecked Europe.

Along the northern and north central fronts conferences are being held between British and Canadian corps commanders and their opposite numbers on the German side. Gen. Von Blaskowitz met Gen. Foulkes, commander of the Canadian Corps which attacked central Holland, today, and arrangements were made for removing explosive charges from the dykes which the enemy had mined. Gen. Straube, who commanded the 86th German Corps between Ems and the Weser, conferred with Gen. Simmons, who commands one of the Canadian Corps, on similar matters today.

The Polish First Armored Division has sent a battle group to Wilhelmshaven, German naval base on the North sea, and British armor is rolling over the Danish frontier. The Seventh Armored Division reached its starting point south of the Danish border sometime yesterday.

Correspondents were stopped from moving across the frontier, however.

PATTON NEARING PRAGUE

While Prague boils with revolution, Patton's tanks and doughboys are pounding on toward the capital through heavy enemy opposition in an area roughly 125 miles east of the city.

Tanks of the Third Army rumbled into Pilsen this morning after a 16-mile advance and are now less than 50 miles from Prague.

According to Czechoslovak sources here most of that city is now liberated but German troops are moving back into the city from surrounding country and an SS unit is holding out in one section and is machine-gunning the civilian population. The Germans admit that Czechoslovak partisans hold two government radio stations.

It was toward this city, seething with the wrongs of six years, that American and Soviet forces smashed.

CARLSBAD SEIZED

Doughboys pushing into Czechoslovakia from the northwest took Carlsbad while another force on the flank reached positions 25 miles northwest of Pilsen, 20 miles south of Carlsbad.

Tanks in the center stormed Pilsen, site of the huge Skoda arms works, and then pushed eastward toward Prague.

Farther south another column, also unidentified, made six miles gain to positions 23 miles southwest of Pilsen.

Columns of the 90th Infantry Division reached the Otava river, 20 miles northeast of Regen while the Fifth Infantry Division advanced to a point 30 miles east of Regen.

PARIS, May 6—Surrender by Grand Admiral Doenitz or one of his representatives of all German forces, including those on the Russian front and in Norway seems imminent. Indications that this will happen in a matter of hours are pouring into London from Stockholm. This correspondent believes the surrender will come very soon.

Eisenhower Can Act for All Allies

Under the terms of an agreement reached between the three governments, Gen. Eisenhower is empowered to receive the surrender of all of the enemy forces so long as it is understood that the surrender is made to all three of the chief powers, Russia, Britain and the United States.

However, since Eisenhower commands French, Dutch, Belgian and Czechoslovak forces, a surrender to him would be in effect a surrender to the governments represented by those forces, small though they may be at present.

Surrender of the German forces is a prerequisite to the proclamation of VE-Day, which should follow within 24 hours after the announcement of surrender.

the area 22 miles north of the town. South of Linz and the Danube the 71st Infantry Division reached positions on the west bank of the Enns river, 16 miles southeast of Linz and about 40 miles from St. Poelten, where the Russians were last reported.

About 2000 Hungarian troops surrendered to the Third Army in the area just south of Linz. Two Russian armies advancing westward in central Czechoslovakia have encountered stubborn resistance in the center but have made good progress in the north.

A third force has entered the picture in Czechoslovakia and Austria for the Fifth Army of Gen. Clark's 15th Army Group has crossed the Austrian frontier.

The Third Army took 15,000 prisoners yesterday and has captured 173,000 Germans in the last two weeks.

It is almost impossible to count the hordes of German prisoners in the north. There are 120,000 German soldiers in Holland, and this is probably the only coherent group in the area. Elsewhere both German and American and British commanders are working to sort out prisoners into their respective units.

HUGE ROUND-UP

Thousands are still coming into the Allied lines. The Ninth Army has counted 65,776 prisoners in the past three days, boosting its army total to 519,793, of which 415,839 have been captured since Gen. Simpson's divisions crossed the Rhine on March 24. The Ninth Army is now in what is described as "firm contact" along the whole of its front.

The British Second Army has captured more than 60 generals and found the body of Field Marshal Von Bock, known to the German soldiers as "the killer" because of his reckless disregard for cost in lives of his attacks.

Von Bock, who commanded the central group of the German armies in Russia in 1941, was wounded by RAF bombs about a week ago and died soon afterwards.

Vice-Admiral Michelins of the German navy was also captured by the British.

REIMS, France, May 7 (AP)—Germany surrendered unconditionally to the western Allies and Russia at 2:41 A. M. French time today.

(This was at 8:41 P. M., Eastern War Time, Sunday).

The surrender took place at a little red schoolhouse which is the headquarters of Gen. Eisenhower.

The surrender which brought the war in Europe to a formal end after five years, eight months and six days of bloodshed and destruction was signed by Germany by Col.-Gen. Gustav-Jodl.

Jodl is the new chief-of-staff of the German army.

It was signed for the Supreme Allied command by Lt.-Gen. Walter Bedell Smith, chief of staff for Gen. Eisenhower.

It was also signed by Ivan Susloparoff for Russia and by Gen. Francois Sevez for France.

EISENHOWER STERN

Gen. Eisenhower was not present at the signing, but immediately afterwards Jodl and his fellow delegate, Gen. Admiral Hans Georg Friedeburg, were received by the supreme commander.

They were asked sternly if they understood the surrender terms imposed upon Germany and if they would be carried out by Germany.

APPEAL FOR MERCY

Germany, which began the war with a ruthless attack upon Poland, followed by successive aggressions and brutality in intermittent camps, surrendered with an appeal to the victors for mercy toward the German people and armed forces.

JODL SPEAKS

After signing the full surrender, Jodl said he wanted to speak and was given leave to do so.

"With this signature," he said in soft-spoken German, "the German people and armed forces are for better or worse delivered into the victors' hands."

"In this war which has lasted more than five years both have achieved and suffered more than perhaps any other people in the world."

CAPITAL IS CALM

Generally, Washington took the dramatic news from Reims in stride, indicating that it was prepared to heed for the most part President Truman's recommendation that the end of the long struggle in Europe be made the occasion for dedication to the still difficult task of disposing of Japan.

Throughout the maze of government buildings, there were brief time-outs for subdued exchanges of gratification, but in the main there was a "business as usual" atmosphere.

A few spectators gathered to press against the White House iron fence, but on adjacent Pennsylvania Avenue, traffic moved at normal pace.

Official cars came and went through the iron gates of the executive mansion with the same routine of any other day.

Lafayette Square, across Pennsylvania Avenue from the White House, was virtually deserted during the morning hours.

WAR ENDS IN EUROPE

V-E Day Proclamation Expected Very Soon

LONDON, May 7 (By the Associated Press)—The greatest war in history ended by with the unconditional surrender of Germany.

The surrender of the Reich to the western Allies and Russia was made at Gen. Eisenhower's headquarters at Reims, France, by Col. Gen. Gustaf Jodl, chief-of-staff German army.

This was announced officially after German broadcasts told the German people that Grand Admiral Karl Doenitz had ordered the capitulation of all fighting forces, and called off the U-boat war.

GREATEST, BLOODIEST IN HISTORY

Joy at the news was tempered only by the realization that the war against Japan remains to be resolved, with many casualties still ahead.

The end of the European warfare, greatest, bloodiest and costliest war in human history — it has claimed at least 40,000,000 casualties on both sides in killed, wounded and captured — came after five years, eight months and six days of strife that overspread the globe.

Hitler's arrogant armies invaded Poland on Sept. 1, 1939, beginning the agony that convulsed the world for 2319 days.

Unconditional surrender of the beaten remnants of his legions first was announced by the Germans.

The historic news began breaking with a Danish broadcast that Norway had been surrendered unconditionally by its conquerors.

Then the new German foreign minister, Ludwig Schwerin von Krosigk, announced to the German people, shortly after 2 P. M. (8 A. M. Boston time), that "after almost six years of struggle we have succumbed."

DOENITZ ORDERS UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER

Von Krosigk announced Grand Admiral Karl Doenitz had "ordered the unconditional surrender of all fighting German troops."

North, South Crumple*

PARIS, May 1—The last defenses of the Third Reich are crumbling as Allied tanks and infantry sweep almost unopposed into the great northern and southern redoubts.

Gen. Patton's Third United States Army has resumed its offensive into Austria, crashing to within 20 miles of Linz and is only 54 miles from Amstetten where the Russian Third Ukrainian Army was last reported. According to reports from the front, radio contact has been established between tanks of the 11th Armored Division and the vanguard of the Soviet armies.

BIRTHPLACE FALLS

Other armored columns of the army have captured Braunau on the Inn river, birthplace of Hitler, on the very day that the Nazi leader's death is reported. Braunau on the Austrian frontier where the German dictator's father was a customs inspector, is only 27½ miles north of Salzburg, eastern gateway to the national redoubt and 41 miles from Berchtesgaden.

The western flank of this redoubt has already been turned by troops of Gen. Patch's Seventh United States Army, who are threading their way through passes of the Austrian Tyrol on a broad front. The doughboys are only ten miles from Innsbruck, center of communications system of the Inn river valley behind the forward ramparts of the redoubt. Further west, pillars of the First French Army are hammering their way into the western most gateway of the redoubt near Immenstadt.

The British have broken out of the Anglo-American bridgehead over the Elbe southeast of Hamburg and bypassing the great port are racing across the base of the enemy's northern redoubt toward Lubeck. Late reports from the front put the vanguard of the Eleventh Armored Division only 18 miles from the Baltic port.

MUNICH MOPPED UP

Behind the front of the Seventh Army, doughboys completed the capture of Munich, third city of the Reich and largest German city yet to be taken by the armies of the United Nations.

Everywhere along the front the story is the same: slackening resistance, prisoners surrendering en masse—one patrol of the Third Army took 1400 captives—and on the southern front German failure to defend the natural obstacles or even road blocks constructed along the highways to the redoubt. The sands of war are running out fast.

The 11th Armored Division, striking arm of the Third Army forces east of the Danube, resumed its drive into Austria today. An expected counter attack by armor concentrated in the area of Passau has not materialized and with the infantry on three sides of the frontier town tanks again smashed into Austria after five days in which the division had pulled in its forward elements and re-grouped for the present onslaught.

Tanks advanced in two columns, one of which smashed southeastward 10 miles to Mayerhof, 20 miles northwest of Linz and 54 miles from Amstetten. Front line dispatches from this division report radio contact already has been made with Gen. Tolbukhin's forces and say the vanguards of the two armies are not more than 40 miles from Linz and encirclement of the German forces remaining in Czechoslovakia.

Another column of the division made seven miles to Depping, 24 miles northwest of Linz, after crossing the Austrian frontier near Ober Kappel, 14 miles east of Passau.

Meanwhile doughboys of the 26th Division, advancing behind tanks, moved to the vicinity of Kollersburg, 10 miles northeast of Passau. Between Armor and the Bohemer wald an unidentified division advanced eight miles to close to the Czech frontier, 22 miles northeast of Passau and sent a column to Sonner, 22 miles northeast of Passau.

The 13th Armored Division paced a sweeping advance southeastward from Isar to the Inn river at Braunau advancing in several columns on a front of 20 miles. One rumbled into Braunau, while another gained 12 miles to within five miles of the Inn river. Resistance was negligible and one patrol took 1400 prisoners in the vicinity of Adeldorf, eight miles east of Landau.

WASHINGTON, May 8---(UP)---President Truman today proclaimed victory in Europe but told the nation its fighting job would be finished only "when the last Japanese division has surrendered unconditionally."

He said "our victory is only half-won." He gave this counsel for the months to come:

"Work, work, work."

He gave this advice to the Japanese: Surrender.

Surrounded by his government leaders, Mr. Truman issued his proclamation of victory and his statement of the work yet to do at a historic news conference in the White House. Then he broadcast them to the nation.

SOLEMN BUT GLORIOUS HOUR

Outside, while the President spoke, a chill rain fell.

"This," the President said, "is a solemn but glorious hour."

He voiced the thought of millions by adding:

"How I wish Franklin Roosevelt had lived to see this day."

The President reminded the nation in its flush of victory that it had not been fighting alone. And he proclaimed Sunday, May 13, a day of prayer.

PRESIDENT CALLS FOR PRAYERS

"I call upon all the people of the United States, whatever their faith, to unite in offering joyful thanks to God for the victory we have won and to pray that He will support us to the end of our present struggle and guide us into the way of peace."

"I also call upon my countrymen to dedicate this day of prayer to the memory of those who have given their lives to make possible our victory."

(He did not use the words, "V-E Day.")

The President sent his congratulations and thanks to

Prime Minister Winston Churchill, Premier Josef Stalin, Gen. Charles de Gaulle.

To Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower he said:

"All of us owe to you and your men of many nations a debt beyond appraisal for their high contribution to the conquest of Nazism."

Mr. Truman counted the cost of victory. He did not forget "the terrible price we have paid to rid the world of Hitler and his evil band."

But he also sounded a note of triumph and hope.

"United, the peace-loving nations," he said, "have demonstrated in the West that their arms are stronger by far than the might of dictators or the tyranny of military cliques that once called us soft and weak."

MUST BIND UP WOUNDS

"The power of our peoples to defend themselves against all enemies will be proved in the Pacific war as it has been proved in Europe."

And with victory, the President said, "We must work to bind up the wounds of a suffering world—to build an abiding peace, a peace rooted in justice and in law."

For the Japanese, he said, the choice is between unconditional surrender and "utter destruction to Japan's industrial war production, to its shipping, and to everything that supports its military activity."

He gave Japan this promise, this invitation to survival:

"Unconditional surrender does not mean the extermination or enslavement of the Japanese people."

JAPAN'S CHOICE

He spelled out patiently the choice which is Japan's.

"The longer the war lasts," he said, "the greater will be the suffering and hardships which the people of Japan will undergo—all in vain."

"Our blows will not cease until the Japanese military and naval forces lay down their arms in unconditional surrender."

"Just what does unconditional surrender of the armed forces mean for the Japanese people?"

"It means the end of war."

"It means the termination of the influence of the military leaders who have brought Japan to the present brink of disaster."

"It means provision for the return of soldiers and sailors to their families, their farms, their jobs."

"It means not prolonging the present agony and suffering of the Japanese in the vain hope of victory."

Gen. George C. Marshall, Army chief of staff, and Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson and many others added their voices to observance of V-E Day.

Marshall told the men in Europe that they had composed, with their Allies, the greatest military team in history. But he did not forget the men who have been fighting so long in the Pacific. They will be getting help soon, he said, and rest.

MARSHALL TO VETERANS

To veterans throughout the world Marshall said:

"Those veterans who have long been overseas and suffered hazards and hardships of many battles should be spared further sacrifices, but others must move in an overwhelming flood to the Pacific to bring that war to the earliest possible conclusion as well as to relieve the war-weary veterans in that theater."

Stimson said the German leaders had been shattered, but added:

"They must be watched lest they again poison civilization."

Japan, Stimson said, will get what Germany got.

"We are fighting one vast war for a decent world," he said. "We shall continue that war wherever it has to be fought with all our righteous might until the last sign of power in our enemies has disappeared from sight."

It was one of the most colorful, dramatic news conferences in the history of the White House. The President was surrounded by his family—Mrs. Truman in a dark blue suit and light blue blouse, and their daughter, Mary Margaret, in a blue suit and white blouse. Close friends and associates, the Cabinet, leaders of the armed forces and ranking members of Congress also were present.

His congratulatory messages to the Allied heads of state were similar, each congratulating the Allied peoples and the Allied armies for their heroism, and expressing appreciation of the American people and this government for their cooperation and "splendid contribution to the cause of civilization and liberty."

BACK TO JOBS

Government workers and officials took V-E Day in stride. Where possible they listened to the President's broadcast and then went back to their jobs, as he previously had asked them to do. The capitol virtually was deserted at that early hour—to the disappointment of three soldiers, bound for Germany to join occupational forces, who had hoped to see how the House and Senate reacted.

At the war and navy departments it was a quiet day. The war department had planned a little ceremony outdoors, but it was cancelled. The official reason: "rain and work."

TRUMAN'S VICTORY SPEECH—President Harry S. Truman is shown as he proclaimed victory in Europe to the American nation, and urged continued "Work, work and work" until the defeat of our Pacific foe.

Eisenhower Thanks All Allied Forces

Hails Success Of Great 'Crusade'

LONDON, May 8 (UP) — Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, in a V-E Day order of the day, thanked the men and women of the Allied Expeditionary Force and said they had "taken in stride the military tasks so difficult as to be classed by many doubters as impossible."

PRAISES LOYALTY

"The crusade on which we embarked in the early summer of 1944 has reached its glorious conclusion," Eisenhower said, referring to the D-Day landing on Normandy.

"It is my special privilege in the name of all the nations represented in this theater of war to commend each of you for valiant performance of duty. Though these words are feeble they come from the bottom of a heart overflowing with pride in your loyal service and admiration for you as warriors.

"Your accomplishments at sea, in the air, on the ground and in the field of supply have astonished the world. Even before the final week of conflict you had put 5,000,000 of the enemy permanently out of the war.

CONFUSED FOE

"You have taken in stride military tasks so difficult as to be classed by many doubters as impossible. You have confused, defeated and destroyed your savagely fighting foe.

"On the road to victory you have endured every discomfort and privation and have surmounted every obstacle which ingenuity and desperation could throw in your path. You did not pause until our front was firmly joined up with the great Red Army coming from the east and other Allied forces coming from the south.

"Full victory in Europe has been attained. Working and fighting together in a single and indestructible partnership you have achieved a perfection in unification of air, ground and naval power that will stand as a model in our time.

ULTIMATE SACRIFICE

"The route you have traveled through hundreds of miles is marked by graves of former comrades. From them have been exacted the ultimate sacrifice.

"The blood of many nations—American, British, Canadian, Polish, French and others—has helped to gain the victory. Each of the fallen died as a member of a team to which you belong, bound together by a common love of liberty and a refusal to submit to enslavement.

"No monument of stone, no memorial of whatever magnitude could so well express our respect and veneration for their sacrifice as would perpetuation of the spirit of comradeship in which they died.

"As we celebrate victory in Europe let us remind ourselves that our common problems of the immediate and distant future can best be solved in the same conceptions of co-operation and devotion to the cause of human freedom as have made this expeditionary force such a mighty engine of righteous destruction.

day in the midst of one of its fastest drives of the war.

First reports from the front indicated that doughboys of the 80th Infantry Division fired the Third Army's last shot of the war in the Austrian mountains southwest of Linz early Monday morning.

The Yanks ran into a concentration of about 2000 Nazi Elite Guards near the village of Schmarstein and were deploying to knock them out when the cease fire order reached them.

Tully in Berlin; Tells of Wild 70-Mile Dash

Feted by Reds While Battle
For Capital Rages Around Him

By ANDREW TULLY
[Traveler Staff Correspondent]

BERLIN, April 27 (Friday 8 P. M. Delayed)—I arrived in Berlin a few minutes ago.

I am one of the first three Americans to enter Germany's capital, at this moment a crashing battleground.

With me are Virginia Irwin of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and my driver, Sgt. Johnny Wilson of Roxbury, Mass., and the 26th (Yankee) Division.

To get here, we drove 70 miles through Russian lines—from the town of Torgau on the Elbe river, where American and Russian troops made official contact.

BERLIN, April 28 (Delayed)—The Russian army in action is a cross between an excursion to Revere Beach and the Charge of the Light Brigade.

UNIQUE CONTRASTS

If your jeep can escape being overrun by one of the big Studebaker trucks driven by relentless non-coms you're still in danger of having your arm bitten off by one of the horses dragging the hundreds of medieval farm carts.

Our party of two war correspondents and an Army sergeant are the first Americans to see the Russian army in combat. What we are seeing is an army of fantastic, almost

German Capital No Man's Land In Death Fight

Traveler Reporter Sees Russians
Killing Nazis, Building by Building

BERLIN, April 28 (Delayed)—Running a gantlet of bursting shells, seemingly falling in aimless fashion throughout the city, I got to within 16 blocks of the famous Unter den Linden today.

I was within 10 blocks of the historic Wilhelmstrasse, where a little man named Hitler once ruled the Third Reich.

VICIOUS BATTLE RAGES IN CITY

Specifically, I was in the Schoneberg section in the southwest part of the city, about 200 yards up the Ebers Strasse, which leads to the Kolonnen.

Unless I wanted to form a one-man task force I could go no farther, for the entire center of the city was a no-man's land. With shell fragments spraying the air and buildings collapsing under the force of a thunderous artillery attack, the air was a permanent bluish gray from the numerous pitched battles which went on all around. The reek of gunpowder was almost stifling.
